

To

From

Dedication.

Oh, balmy Summer days, when youth is ours,
And all life's fields are deck'd with golden grain, Oh, may we trust that when in Autumn's glow, Like gladsome hours will come to us again.
Aye, come in love, grown stronger year by year,
So that, within each flower's crimson glow,
We trace the blossom of life's noblest seed, Sown by our trembling hands long, long ago.

Poppies.

A collection of Poems by

Edith Prince Snowden.

Illustrated by

Florence Prince and

Amy Sawyer.

TRADE MARK.
COPYRIGHT.

RAPHAEL TUCK & SONS.

LONDON, PARIS, NEW YORK.

DESIGNED AT THE LONDON STUDIOS AND

AND PRINTED AT THE FINE ART WORKS IN SAXONY.

The Afterglow.

Once more, as Autumn tints the drooping leaves,
I see an ancient garden
that I know.
The trees and flowers,
soft trembling in the breeze,
Are wrapt in sunset's beauteous afterglow.

*S*ince first we met and lov'd the years have fled, Fraught with more changes than my heart may know, Yet, deeper than all present music, rings
The meaning of the vows made long ago.

Sometimes,
in dreams, I hold your hand in mine,

Sometimes, in dreams,
I see you as of yore,
But, waking, know the music of your voice

Is hush'd in silence here for evermore.

Dream Poppies.

She carried poppies
in her slender hands,
And gently on my eyelids laid them down;

I heard the rustle of her snow-white robe,
I felt the pressure of my scarlet crown,

And then in sleep I seem'd all The beauteous field where waving And pure white angels o'er the flower Walk to sweet music in their rosy glow.

fair to see,
poppies blow,
deck'd mead

While some, with posies of the richest hue, Fresh cull'd and languid with their weight of bloom, Pass far beyond, the pearly Gates between,

To lay the flowers on some nameless tomb.

And some who carry balm for pain or woe,
A gleam of sunshine o'er a mist
of tears,

Sing gently in the shade, awaking Hope

In human souls, oppress'd with earthborn fears.

Poppies.

Poppies, low - bending
your scarlet heads, Saw ye my True Love pass?
Heard ye the music of tiny feet
Treading the waving grass?
Caught ye the echo
of some sweet song, Floating adown the plain,
Laden with Hope that the tender words Live in my heart again?

Faint airy voices,
 amid your leaves

Softly as dream-bells ring, Telling the song was a song of love
You heard the maiden sing.

As she went flitting across the grass, Wandering down to the sea,
 Where I shall find her, I know full well, Watching, and waiting for me.

Brother and Sister.

O silent Love, I pray thee fold thy wings,

And whisper once again of hope to me,

Sweet hope, with gleams of golden light serene,

To guide my wandering footsteps nearer thee.

Hast thou forgotten ev'ry joy of earth,

The waking promise of our life's young May,

Or deep within thy heart,

still echoes low,

The tender mem'ry

of a vanish'd

day?

O hush!

I may not grieve,
for God has given Another love about my life to twine,
A heart whose sorrow forms yet one more link
To bind our lives still closer unto thine;
And calmly, as the flowers of Summer bloom,
My sister's hand in mine, I seem to know,
The gentle rustling of white angel wings Awak'ning all the hope of long ago.

FINIS.

What are the poppies whisp'ring
to the breeze Slow swaying in the silence to and fro,
And bearing deep within their crimson hearts, Faint dream-like echoes
of a long ago?
Oh, sleep and rest, they softly seem to say, The Angel Peace is
wafting odours sweet,
And Summer winds are stirring 'mid our leaves With gentlest kiss your wearyed eyes to greet.

37131053 599 395

