Anobleman of high estate
And wealth that unto such amasses,
Announced to give a May-day fete
To all the town and country lasses,
And had it known that he would wed,
Not she of heritage the rarest,
But that attending guest instead Whose face the freshest was and fairest.

Miss Haughty, looking in her glass
When came the princely proclamation
Deigned not to think the prize could pass
To person of a lowly station;
She gazed upon her costly gown,
Rouged up her artificial blushes
And said, "How nicely I'll take down
That freckled Miss among the rushes."

Poor Daisy Dean—that freckled miss—
Above the glassy brook was bending,
She'd heard of May-day fete, and this
Her speech with odorous breezes blending,
“They tell me that my eyes are bright
My form and features worthy praises,
But ah! these horrid freckles blight
All hope of man's approving phrases.”

With saddened face and languid tread

She moved along thro' teeming grasses,
Beyond the bars a railway lead
Along the mead; anon there passes
A speeding train, and at her feet,
From open window blown there nestles
A slip of paper white and neat
As gleaming sails on sun-kissed vessels.

Miss Daisy grasped it, down among The budding king-cups meanwhile sitting,
And as she read, there seemed a song
Of promise thro' her senses flitting,
The shadow from her face had flown,
She felt that fortune had endowed her
With hope, for this to her made known
Pozzoni's pure Complexion Powder.

An interval of days, and came
The May-day fete. Among the bowers
That did the spacious chateau frame
Clustered, like variegated flowers,
A score of maidens, dark and fair;
Then noblemen and friends appearing
They mingled on the greensward there
And nimbly danced to music cheering.

The dancing o'er, the host announced
The moment of the May-queen's choosing,
Miss Haughty-jewelled, rouged and flounced-
Stood forth, no doubt her pride confusing,
While Daisy shyly sought the gloom
Far backward of the waiting misses,
With face like tint of apple bloom
When washed by morning's dewy kisses.

A moment's silence, then was seen
The host pass through the group, and bowing
To Daisy said, "I crown thee Queen"
Miss Haughty heard his frank avow-
ing
And frowned, but as he proudly drew
Miss Daisy to him, even prouder
She was to give the credit to Pozzoni's pure Complexion Powder.
