a de la compañía de la

A S Ŵ E R N TO THE ERIES, \mathbf{U}^{-} CONTAINED IN A LETTER to Dr. SHEBBEARE, Printed in the PUBLIC LEDGER, August 10. TOGETHER WITH ANIMADVERSIONS ON TWO SPEECHES In Defence of the PRINTERS of A PAPER, fubscribed a SOUTH BRITON. The FIRST pronounced by

The Right Hon. THOMAS TOWNSHEND, in the Houfe of Commons,

And printed in the LONDON PACKET of February 18.

The SECOND by

The Right Learned Counfellor L E E, in GUILDHALL,

And printed in the PUBLIC LEDGER of August 12.

In the Examination of which a Comparison naturally arifes between the public and private Virtues of Their Prefent Majesties, and those of King William and Queen Mary. The Merits, alfo, of Roman Catholics, and of Diffenters from the Church of England, respecting Allegiance and Liberty, and their Claims to National Protection, are fairly stated, from their past and prefent Transactions.

By .	ſ. S	HE	EBI	B E	A R	E, M. D.	,
Falfus Quem	hono nifi n	r juv: nendo	at, ei olum	t mer et m	idax enda	infamia terre cem.	t Hor.
	L	0	N	D	0	N :

Printed for S. HOOPER, at No. 25, Ludgate-Hill; and T. DAVIES, in Russel-Street, Covent-Garden.

[Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.]

111

A N

A N S W E R

TO THE

QUERIES, &c.

HERE are few propenfities more prevalent among the individuals of human kind, whole transactions have been the least removed from the most common that can happen, than a perfuasion that the daily occurrences of their lives are of fo intereiling a kind, as to be highly deferving the attention of the public. This opinion of their importance chiefly arifes from the partiality of felflove. Each of them not only observes, with a depreciating eye, the actions of other men; but beholds, in a too favourable aspect, his own also. From this origin have fprung the numerous memoirs and lives which have been obtruded on the world, not only by men who have been their own biographers; but by fuch alfo who have applied, to the talents of others, through a confcious deficiency in their own. The motive of my appearing before the public, on this occasion, arifes В

1

4)

(

arifes not from that caule, but from the defire of not being deemed more culpable than I am; and of defending myfelf from fuch calumny, as no man, the least susceptible of the emotions of an honeft heart, can fuffer to remain unanswered, without being juftly charged, either with an unpardonable intenfibility to the claims of character; or with an impoffibility of obviating the acculations which are laid against him. For although no man of fenfe will think it either neceffary, or even prudent, to reply to the obloquy and invectives of anonymons writers, who may have defamed him by a relation of circumitances that never exifted; by mifreprefentations of those which have, when they are not of an immoral nature, and of no concern to the public; yet does it fometimes happen, although the accufer withhold his name, that the facts on which he grounds his acculations may be incontrovertible, notwithftanding the manner, in which they are reprefented, imparts a falfehood to all that he relates; and the nature of them may be fo criminal, that to abitain from attempting a refutation, would be justly confidered as a conceffion to their truth, and adequate to felf-condemnation.

Innumerable are the inftances of the former kind of publications against me, to which I have never given the least reply. Of the latter, there has appeared a paper, in the Public Ledger, of the 10th of August, which no man, who is not dead to every laudable fensation, can fuffer and remain in filence. The malevolence it contains is directed against the most estimable part of every man's character, his integrity. It is folely on that account that I am induced, in this manner, to make my appeal. And I would willingly (5) lingly hope, that, on fo interesting an occasion, the vindication of a private man will not be deemed an impertinent obtrusion on the public.

On the 29th of July, a paper was printed in the Public Ledger, under the denomination of "a " character of Dr. Shebbeare." In this notable performance, it was faid, that "John Shebbeare " was bred an apothecary, if he had any breeding, " dubbed a doctor of phylic at a foreign feminary, " where degrees are held in equal effimation as at " a Scotch univerfity : that is, affes might have, " if affes could bray or pay for them." This, I imagine, is the first time it has been afferted, that affes are not doctors of physic, because they cannot bray. However, from this specimen of this writer's wit, fatire, and good manners, may it not be fairly inferred, that he is justly entitled, by his talents, to the degree of doctor, without being obliged to pay for them. In whatever part of the world I took my degree, I would hope that what I have written in phyfic, has neither difgraced the univerfity from which I received it, nor induced the faculty to pronounce me a novice in my profession.

However, "being thus dignified," he fays, "I "fet up for a writer, and received fubscriptions, "to a confiderable amount, for an history of Eng-"land, which, to this hour, has never been pub-"lished." To this part, he shall receive an anfwer, when I come to examine his paper of the toth of August.

He then fays, I "poured out fuch foul abufe on "the late king, that the ministry, more loyal "than the present, proceeded against me with "justice." In this place, I apprehend, this gentleman-like writer lies under a mistake. In what did I pour foul abuse on the late king, or on any other (6) other perfon? And when he pronounced the minifiry of that king to be more loval than the pretent, had he forgotten that these loyal ministers of George the fecond, when rebellion was in the realm, in one body threatened to defert him, unlefs he dumiffed lord Granville from his fervice, and obtained their end? have the prefent ministry prefumed to treat their fovereign with an infult fo egregioully difloyal? have any minifters fince his majefty's acceffion to the throne, factificed the honour and the welfare of Great Britain to German interefts? have they chained a British fleet in the bay of Gibraltar, whillt those of France were uniting, in order to obtain the retreat of a French army, from the confines of Hanover? have they defeated an experition against Rocheforte, for the fake of concluding a treaty at Clofter-Seven: or are fuch transactions the proofs of loyalty in this writer's opinion? if they profecuted me with juffice, did I not attone for the offence with a fufficient fuffering? however, he adds, "the doctor, " by this, obtained his end: he received a pu-" nifhment, which, to a virtuous character, would " be worfe than death; to him it was diffinguifked " exaltation." Does it not feem to be a lingular conceit of his, that I wrote on purpose to be punished? and, if the punishment can constitute the crime, I am apprehensive this ingenious writer will be mightily puzzled to prove that the martyrs, and even the apoldes, whole punifhments were greater than mine, were not men of lefs virtuous character than I am. As to my exaltation, it was diffinguished enough. And, if that were my end in writing, I obtained it. And fo far am I from a defire of engroffing fuch diffinguifhed exaltation, that I fincerely with the writer of this paper, and of (7) of another, of the 10th of August, may be rewarded according to his deferts; and then he will be equally diffinguished and exalted.

Upon this exaltation, it feems, "I became no-"ticed and infolent: ever fupercilious, and now "contemptibly arrogant, affected an air of great-"nefs, and frowned difapprobation on kings, "treated Galen with contempt, no longer thought "of fupplying hofpitals with bandages, but pre-"fcribed for the confitution, propeted flyptics to "heal its wounds, and wifhed, like another Sa-"cheverel, to fee my comely portrait grace the "bottom of an old-maid's urinal:" all which being fo prettily told, fo ftrictly decent, and fo important to the public, what pity it is that I cannot acquiefce in the truth of things that would do me fo much honour !

This gentleman-like writer now fays, "the " doctor had his wifh: he became popular; if to " be known for a libeller of the king, and defpifed " as a traducer of the revolution, can be deemed " popularity." Now, it fo happens that I was not accufed of libelling the king, or of traducing the revolution, but of writing a fixth letter to the people of England, and therefore I could neither be found guilty of, nor known for, either of those offences: nor did I become popular on thefe, or on any other accounts. And yet, the first of them, alone, hath fince fufficed to make one man the most popular, and the most fignal patriot of the age. He continues: "and thus, pointed at " by the rabble, dudained by men of fenfe, and " execrated by every friend to the family on the " throne, I was a proper fubject for minifters like " the prefent to penfion, to patronize, and to " employ." Among the men of fense, will this writer writer prefume to count himfelf, who in every line gives demonstration that he must be eminent among the rabble: or among the friends of the family on the throne, whole allegiance expired with the late king: if we may judge from his filence respecting his present sovereign, and his farcas on the ministers?

(

These ministers, I find, are as reprobate as myfelf. And, as fimiles fimilibus gaudent, I expect they will improve their patronage of me. For can it be confittent, either with honour or confiience, to fuffer me to be traduced, as magnificently as if I were a lord of the treafury at leaft, for fo fmall a fum as two hundred a year? if this circumstance be not duly regarded, to be calumniated can no longer be effectived the infeparable characteriflic of a great man. For their own fakes, therefore, I humbly hope that they will exalt me, not in this writer's way, that I may approach more nearly to their height; and that no further difgrace be brought on their greatness, by a liberality of malediction on a person fo inferior as I am, both in rank and profit, and fuch as would do honour to a fecondary, if not a prime minister. As to the affair of my employment, this gentleman and a multiplicity of others, by their judicious treatment of his majefty and his ministers, the propriety of their representations, the truth of their affertions, the force of their arguments, the wit and fatire of their publications, have driven the band of penfioners quite out of the field; rendered all writing on the fide of administration unnecessary; and produced the very effects which were diametrically opposite to their Have they not evinced, in a manner intention. that can require no aniwer, that his majely is an arrant Jacobite, and is now actually preparing to furrender furrender his crowns, kingdoms, and dominions to the pretender : that in order to facilitate this wonderful revolution, he is now, by all poffible means, endeavouring to bring popery ding dong into this realm; to eftablish the mass by bell, book and candle, and within fix weeks to rekindle the fires in Smithfield; that the archbishops and bithops, who proteft against the popish religion, and the ministers who protest against all religions, are united heart and hand in this idolatrous defign. That, by affenting to a flatute enacted for the eftablishment of a legislature, in Canada, according to the request of the subjects in that province, his majefty hath violated his coronation oath, in which he fwears to govern according to the flatutes of this realm; and that by thus acting, according to this request of the Canadians, he hath made them all flaves, they and their progeny for ever.

(9)

In like manner have they not proved, that his majefty hath most egregiously infracted the first article of Magna Charta, in which it is faid, " the " church of England shall be free, enjoy all her " rights entire, and her liberties unhurt." That this infraction is accomplifhed by permitting the Canadians to enjoy the religion in which they were bred, which was granted them on the capitulation at Quebec, and is that very religion, which alone existed in England, when, for the preservation of the church, this very Magna Charta was made? all which things are proved in a manner fo convincing, that nothing remains to be written against them that can add vigour to the effects they have produced in the minds of all men of common underftandings. By these means are we not not fupplanted, and they become the minifter's beft friends? And, if the effect may be divided from the caufe, are they not the propereft objects for being penfioned? But alas! fuch are the fublime and difinterefted fentiments of their fouls, and fuch their animofity to corruption, that the thought of forfaking patriotifm for pence, can find no entrance into fuch pure and conftitutional bofoms.

(01)

Naturalists have remarked that, of all animals, a hog is the leaft formed for fwimming : and whenever he prefumes to undertake it, that from his want of fkill in that exercife, he cuts his throat by the milapplication of his fore-feet; perifhes in the prefumption; is given to the dogs; and men are deprived of many a good ham and flitch of bacon. This animal I take to be the archetype of the prefent antiministerial writers. For, by having engaged the right hoof in that tafk, to which, by nature, they are unequal, they have cut their own throats; are become carrion; flink in the noftrils of all honeft men; are food only for the hounds of modern patriots; and the world is thereby robbed of many a ftout ploughman and nimble taylor.

On this account, I humbly intreat that the patriotic gentlemen, who have the intereft of poor old England fo much at heart, and find their prefent penmen fo abfolutely incorrigible, will withhold them from thefe acts of fuicide, and hire fome abfe-headed writer, to publifh fomething clever against the ministry. And I wish it might contain a plentiful fprinkling of point, epigram, and antithefis, dreffed in fublime diction, adorned with the blooming flowers of rhetoric, and animated by a ftrut of important ftyle, raifing private events into into public mifchiefs, converting meritorious characters into the dettroyers of their country, and the vileft of men into the moft difinterefted defenders of the conftitution, and the friends of liberty. Unlefs this be fpeedily done, I greatly apprehend that we poor penfioners mult, through mere policy, be obliged to write against the ministers, in order to produce a calumny that may be worthy of a reply; and thereby to preferve ourfelves in some degree of confideration with thole at the head of public affairs.

The gentleman, having exerted his amazing talents on me, proceeds to a fecond exercise of them, on my fon, and fays, "John Shebbeare, " the fon of the former, was defigned for an at-" torney's office, where he might have cut a fi-" gure;"-- and thus, this gentleman proves himfelf to be as great a conjuror as he is a writer. For he not only difcovers my defigns; but pronounces for what my fon is fit, without information of the former, or experience of the latter. He perlifts: " at the initigation, if not at the expence of Dr. "Wilfon, he was fent to Oxford, to learn Jaco-" bitifm, under the famous Dr. King, and to " preach up obedience, for confcience fake, to the " de facto king on the throne." It is time enough to answer the if, when it is afferted as a fact; in the mean while, neither I nor my fon have the least inclination to difown the favours we have received from Dr. Wilfon: whatever they were, we accepted them with due acknowledgement, and remember them with gratitude. But if my fon were fent to learn Jacobitism at Oxford, he egregioufly milapplied his time; even according to the opinion of this able writer. For it has been hitherto thought, that Jacobites are taught obedience, for С for conficience fake, to a king de jure. But, it feems, my fon learnt to preach obedience, for conficience fake, to a king de facto. Which is just as tenfible as to fay, that, being bound an apprentice to a fhoe-maker, he learnt his 'trade by making hobnails. Now it fo happens that he is convinced that our fovereign on the throne is king de jure, as well as de facto. Does not this circumstance fully evince how admirably this gentleman is qualified to write on political subjects?

He continues; "happily, this young man's " parts not rifing above mediocrity, he has neither " difgraced the kingdom nor himfelf, by any pub-" lication in the literary way." I am obliged to the gentleman for his civility: and am heartily forry I cannot return him the compliment, refpecting bis parts and bis publications. However, it feems, "Dr. Wilfon employed this fon of mine to " prove, for the fatisfaction of the conficientious, " that a flained-glafs window might be fet up over " the altar-piece of St. Margaret's church, with-" out an idolatrous intention. This proof, worked " up into a pamphlet, was foon found on stalls; " for even the finging boys thought it a defpicable " composition." The most striking part of this paragraph is its confiftency with the former. For, it feems, "the young man, who had not difgraced " himfelf by any literary publication," had, neverthelefs, difgraced himfelf by publishing a compolition too defpicable for the approbation of the finging boys, who, as they are, undoubtedly, moft excellent judges, ought to be deemed of great weight in literary fubjects. It appears, however, from this circumstance of the finging boys, that this differning writer hath miftaken Sr. Margaret's church for Westminster-Abbey: for to the latter, latter, I conceive, the finging boys belong. "The " proof, however, was worked up into a pamphlet," which paffage, had it been written by a man of common understanding only, would have been, the pampblet worked up into a proof, " was foon found " on ftalls;" where it will be in vain to look for the incomparable publications of this gentleman. They have received their proper application, have discharged their duty, and are funk to that place of repose, which is dettined for all such useful performances.

(13

Errors, like straws, upon the surface flow : He that would seek for pearls must dive below.

The gentleman proceeds: "the young man, " quitting all further attempts to book-making, " took orders, fwallowed the whole thirty-nine, " and bleffed himfelf to think, that what fluck in " other people's throats, the capaciousnes of his " thorax could digeft, without a fingle palliative: " and as the father commenced politician, fo the " fon commenced theologue, through neceffity." As to the "book-making," I shall fay nothing: but, if this description of this young man be to be relied on, he must be of as fingular a conformation in his bodily, as in his mental parts. Firft, he has swallowed the whole thirty-nine orders. Till now, I never heared of more than two; priefts and deacons. In the writings of almost any other fcribe, it might have been imagined, that he had mistaken orders for articles. But in him who talks of the thorax as the place of digestion, can it be lefs than fhare ignorance? however, it feems, this young man is the only clergyman, in whole throat these thirty-nine orders did not ftick, which feems to

14)

(

to be fomewhat furpr fing, fince fo many thousands are now walking about, all alive, unchoaked by Be that as it may: they were cleverly them. fwallowed into his capacious thorax. Till now, it has been thought that the throat led into the ftomach; but, in my young man, it leads into the thorax, where, it feems, they are digefted, without "palliatives." Hence it is clear, that my fon has his ftomach where others have their lungs, and his lungs where others have their ftomachs; or that the flomach is placed in the thorax together with the lungs. As this is the only true and genuine formation of a church of England divine; as my young man is the only perion to formed; and he alone has fwallowed the whole thirty-nine orders, and bleffed himfelf that they did not flick in his throat, why are the ministry to blind to fuch fingular qualifications? why do they not make him a dean at least to begin with? is not this amazing neglect of advancing the only man who is truly formed to be every thing in the church of England, a most convincing proof, and the only one I wish to have removed, that his majesty and his ministers are rank papists. For to what other reasons can it be imputed, that the only man in the kingdom, to truly, to ecclefiaftically, and to cannonically formed, fhould remain without preferment? And is not this the first time that palliatives have been faid to digeit? Will it not prove an embarraffing fubject, to decide whether this gentleman be more incomparable as a divine, an anatomist, a physician, or a writer? and, let me tell him, if neceffity made me a politician, and the young man a theologue, as he calls him, we have much to offer in our behalf, from being compelled by fo irrefiftable a caufe.

The gentleman now returns to me : " the fuc-" cefs of the one, however, involved in it the " prosperity of the other." Being found guilty of a libel, standing on the pillory, three years imprifonment and a fine feem to be but an odd fuccels on my fide. However, it involved in it the prosperity of my young man. I have heared it faid, "happy is the child whole father goes to the " devil;" but I never heared, till now, that the fame good fortune attends the children of those who ftand on the pillory, yet I hope it will prove true. However, the writer may take the hint, be equally fuccessful, and involve in it the prosperity of his own progeny, by the like means. The holes are open to him. He now adds, "for as old Sheb-" beare exhibited his bronzed phyz through the " hole of a pillory, as he was elevated on a wood-" en roftrum, he gained admirers (as culprits at " the gallows gain pity) from the beholders." Now, as I was not the maker of my own phyz. by what means could I prevent its qualities? [exhibited the best face, and the best apparel 1 had; and I was attended with good company. And, if I gained admirers, I fee no occasion for exhibiting a better. As to the comparison of pity and the gallows, I would advife this writer to referve the latter for himfelf, as the only means by which he can obtain the former. " Amongst these behold-" ers," as he fays, "fome of them complimented " my fapient fon with a valuable church living." Now it fo happens, that this living was prefented by a lady, as guardian to her two granddaughters; the first of these was then in Lancafhire, and the children were then unborn. On this account, I humbly prefume that neither of them could could have been my beholder on that day of exaltation.

(15)

(16)

And now fays this incomparable scribe, "if " the reader's indignation is excited, by the con-" duct of the former, that indignation should be " a little softened, out of pity to the latter, who " has fome virtues." I am glad he acknowledges But why, then has he abufed him, without that. provocation ? he then adds, "but what virtues " either of them may poffefs are almost totally " eclipfed by an immoderate fhare of vanity?" and thus, it feems, that I have fome virtues alfo. But what is this immoderate that of vanity? it is that, "those who know the family can bear " witnefs, that it was no uncommon thing (after " the doctor's exaltation on the pillory) for them " to boaft, that they were of French extraction, " and allied, by the grandmother's fide, to fome " of the antient kings of France." As this gentleman feems to be the very quintefcence of truth, it cannot be doubted that he knows fomebody, who knows the family, who can bear witness to the preceding circumitance. But it is all news to me. For I am and ever shall be too much an Englishman, to entertain the vanity of being thought of French extraction. Unlefs, it can be proved, that I am descended from his most christian majesty. Then, indeed, my loving coufin, the king of France, may recommend me to bis loving coufin, the king of Great-Britain, and fome advantage may be derived from my confanguinity. However, I am more than fufpicious, that my pedigree cannot bear contrefs to this defcent, the most extraordinary, I believe, that has ever been known. It is that I am allied, by the grandmother's fide, to fome of the antient kings of France. Till this time.

time, I always imagined that, like other men, I had a father and mother, and that each of them had a father and mother alfo; and therefore that I must have had two grandmothers. But it feems I have been conftantly miftaken. For I am descended directly from one only, the grandmother, and allied, by her fide, to the kings of France. And hereby it should seem that this alliance was not continued, like that of other men, through a father and mother. I confeis it puzzles me much to explain, by what method of procreation I can have had but one grandmother; or, without parents, even fo much as one. And if I had a father and mother, how one woman can be the grandmother of both of them, unlefs mine were brother and fifter, which, I believe, they were not. This itory, of the grandmother and my defcent, would, I imagine, puzzle the whole college of heralds; not only to afcertain the grandmother, but also to exemplify, by any method now in use, my alliance to the French monarchs, without the intervention of two parents. As this boaft did not take place till after my exaltation on the pillory, it would feem as if I obtained this high alliance by afcent, and not by descent. And that, when my body was raised above the heads of the people, my blood, alfo, was exalted above theirs, into blood-royal. But, this gentleman being the sole herald of this descent, he must explain it, or it will never be underftood.

"Such," fays this worthy writer, "is Dr. Sheb-"beare: fuch is the rev. John Shebbeare, his "fon:" and then I readily allow, that be is, in conformation of body, and that I am, in genealogical defcent, not to be equalled in the univerfe.

A thousand

A thousand fuch papers would have been applied to their proper use, unnoticed by me, as a multiplicity of that kind had already been, but on the 10th of August, the following letter appeared in the Public Ledger.

For the Public Ledger.

To Doctor Shebbeare.

Sir,

As you feem difpofed, by candour, to answer every question which may be asked with goodnature, I think it the proper time to propound the following queries:

1. Did you not, many years ago, folicit fubferiptions for an hiftory of England, which you engaged to finish, and declared was then in great forwardness?

2. Did you not receive fubscriptions for this faid hiftory, to a very confiderable amount?

3. Has the work (which to many years ago was in great forwardnets) ever yet appeared in print?

4. Had you at the time you received the fubfcriptions the smallest intention that it should; have you at this instant the smallest intention that it shall ever be published?

5. Ought you not, in common honefty, to return the money to the fubscribers; or in common honour to difcharge the conditional obligation for which you received it?

6. If you do neither of these, have we any occalion to learch the records to prove your infamy? must we look to the pillory for the best wholelength picture of the man; to his public conduct for the best miniature of his moral turpitude?

7. In

7. In case of your death have you deputed your fon to return the fubfcribers their money; or is he to write the hiftory his father was paid before-hand for undertaking? an hiftory from yourfelf would be dull enough in all conteience; an hiftory from your fon would be a feald-miferable production indeed!

8. For what did lord Bute procure you a penfion? for the punctual performance of your promile, or for the fcandalous perfonal abufe you caft on his late majefty ? if you keep your word with government no better than with your fubscribers, administration, if they thought of purchasing your honour, were most confoundedly taken in.

9. With what shadow of reason can you complain of being treated "with ill manners in the " ledger," when you have been fet upon, though not in the pillory, for villifying your fovereign in the groffeft terms?

10. Instead of reviewing the writings of other men, would not your time be more properly employed in a review of your actions, and a preparation for the grave, to which you are now most vifibly haftening?

11. Will it not be very complaifant in you to answer such of these queries as relative to the subscription money received for your "history of " England?"

A Subscriber.

In my answer to A. M's letter, I fay, "this " precaution, however, I think fit to give the " editors of those papers, to whom Mr. A. M. " has already transmitted his letters, that they in-" fert nothing under that fignature, which they " have not actually received. And to this I am " induced

D

" induced by two reafons. Firft, that these who "have flown themfelves to cordially differed to "treat me with ill manners, may not lay hold "on this occation to indulge their flander under "that fignature. And fecondly, that Mr. A. M. "may have nothing imputed to his charge which "he has not written: nor I have any thing to an-"fwer which proceeds not from that perfon. And "I fhall be under no apprehension of not dif-"proving all that he can adduce, and of not fatis-"fying the public that the whole which he hath "afferted, in his letter, is a futile tale and a "groundlefs accufation."

From the preceding paffage, it appears that this correspondent of mine has taken occasion to fay, in the introduction to the queries, "as you feem " difposed, by candour, to answer every question " which may be afked with good-nature," &c. and from hence has thought proper to take up a paffage of the first paper in the ledger, where it is faid, I have received tubleriptions for an hiltory of England, which, to this hour, has never been published. He then assumes the fignature of "a subscriber," and with good nature, as he avers, propounde the antecedent queries. It does not to me appear on what grounds he can conclude that, because I had limited the ill manners and flander, with which I might be treated, to the fubjects folely of papers, under the fignature of A. M. that therefore I feem difposed to answer every queftion, which may be afked, under every other. Might not the perfon, to whom I had lent my furtout, have as reafonably laid claim to the use of all the clothes I possibles? and how the queries, which he afks, can be deemed to proceed from good-nature, is past my conception.

I will

(21)

I will now give both diffinct and faithful answers to every query.

Query ift, Did you not, many years ago, folicit fubfcriptions for an hiftory of England, which you engaged to finish, and declared was then in great forwardness? — Answer, I did folicit such subfcriptions, for a first volume of an history of England, but not in the manner you represent it, in your first paper, as preceding my imprisonment: it was after I was confined in the King's Bench. I engaged to finish it; but I never declared that it was in great forwardness, because it was not then begun.

Q. 2d, Did you not receive fubfcriptions to a very confiderable amount?——A. Not fufficient to pay for paper and printing. And, as a fpecimen of what I received from those who, I thought, were the most likely to promote it, the fubfcriptions from the lords and gentlemen of the Cocoa-tree amounted but to seventeen guineas. But the fimallness of this fum is, by no means, offered as an excuse for the delay in printing it.

Q. 3d, Has the work (which fo many years ago was in great forwardness) ever yet appeared in print? — A. The work was never faid to be in great forwardness, nor has it yet appeared in print.

Q. 4th, Had you, at the time you received the fubicriptions, the fmalleft intention that it fhould? have you, at this inftant, the fmalleft intention that it fhall ever be publifhed? — A. The firft receipts which were delivered, were for a firft volume of an hiltory of England, from the revolution to the prelent time. But, at the perfuasion of my friends, I was induced to alter my defign; and receipts were iffued for a first volume of the history of England, and of the conftitution thereof, from its origin to the prefent time. That volume I wrote, and had it transcribed, whilst I was in prifon: it is now in my pofferfion. Of every receipt I delivered to my friends, to be disposed of, and of every guinea (the terms of the fubfcription) I received, a regular account was kept, which I now have. Both of these shall be open to the inspection of the writer of these queries, if he be in fact a fubscriber; and of every other who may chuse to receive such satisfaction. Is it not therefore too manifeft to be denied, that at the time I proposed to write this hiftory, that I intended the publication of it? with what other imaginable defign could I have given myself the pains of writing it? and although many circumftances of a private and domeftic nature must be included in the subsequent exculpation of myfelf, which few are willing to relate; yet I will postpone that and every other confideration for the fake of truth, and the prefervation of my integrity. I will, therefore, without difguise or refervation, candidly affign my reafons for the delay in printing; and declare my prefent intentions.

D 2

re-

) ſ 22

A few days before my being tried, for writing the fixth letter to the people of England, the dutchefs of Queenfbury, with great juffice, obtained an injunction, to ftop the publishing of the continuation of lord Clarendon's hiftory, which I had printed, and advertifed, in confequence of a written agreement, between Francis Gwynn, elq; and me. In this agreement it was specified that I should be at the expence of paper, printing, and all others, and then that the profit of the work fhould fhould be equally divided between us. In this obligation, that worthy squire declares himself to be juftly entitled to the manufcript from which it was printed : notwithstanding which, as it afterwards appeared, this very manufcript had been furreptitioully obtained. Great part of the money-for printing it had been paid by me; and it was not till fix years after the injunction was obtained, that the caufe was heared, in the court of King's Bench, before lord Mansfield; when, I obtained a verdict, for all the expences incurred by printing the preceding work, amounting to more than five hundred pounds. Of that fum, almost one half had been wafted, on my fide, in the courts of chancery and law. During my confinement, I never received, as prefents, more than twenty guineas, from all the world. And it may eafily be imagined, that my circumstances were not improved by three year's imprilonment. I had no club of partifans, to maintain me during that time; to difcharge my debts; nor even the fine, which I was obliged to pay, after a three year's confinement, for a fingle offence. Notwithstanding the difficulties which inevitably arole from these particulars, and although an infolvent act was paffed, foon after his majefty's acceffion to the throne, and my circumstances might have apologized for my taking that opportunity which it offered; I, neverthelefs, declined from availing myfelf of that occasion, to evade the payment of my debts. I preferred the labour of endeavouring to pay them, and the rifk of being again imprifoned if I did not fucceed. But thank heaven I am in no danger of a fecond imprisonment on that account. And this difinclination to avail myfelf of (24) of the preceding means, will, I hope, be received as force proof, as I am not diffored to free myfelf, without payment, from the demands of money, by whods which that act allowed, that I am not included to acquire it by fraudulent measures.

23)

As it was impracticable, whilft I was in confinement, to procure that variety of books; or to apply to manufcript authorities, for all that was requifite to the compleating of this first volume, I tound, on being releafed from my imprilonment; and on application to the former only, that the volume which I had written, was incorrect, infufficient, and erroneous, in too many particulars, to admit of its being published, without injustice to my fubicribers, and reprehensions on myfelf. Into this difpleating fituation I had been milled, by relying on the authorities of modern hiftorians, who pretend to cite the authors from whence their materials are taken, many of whom appear never to have feen them; but implicitly to have copied one another, and all of them manifestly defective; not only in the authorities they should have fought, but in their omiffions and mifreprefentations of those whom they had confulted : more especially respecting those parts of the old German codes, on which our conflictation is erected, and without which, it cannot be properly explained or underftood. Such being the real fituation of things, I perceived that more time than I could expect to live would be neceffarily required, for fo extensive a work, as the whole hiftory I had proposed; and that a fingle volume, or even a few volumes of an hiftory incomplete, would, by no means, anfwer either the intention of my fubscribers, or my own. I determined, therefore, to change my plan, and

(25)

and to include, in one volume, that which might require no others to compleat this new defign.

From the day I left the King's Bench prifon to the prefent, I declined all folicitation of fubfcriptions: and, although by much the greateft part of the receipts I iffued are not returned, nor the money which anfwers to them. I never have enquired, by letter or otherwife, what was the event of them; nor have I received more than eleven guineas, the laft of which was fo long fince as the 8th of March, 1763. And this I am ready to prove, by the book, in which are entered all the receipts I ever diffributed, and every guinea I have received.

In confequence of this alteration, I refolved to exert my best abilities, not only to trace the conftitution of England from its origin, in the woods of Germany, as Monfieur De Montesquieu expresses it, but from the first principles in human nature, from which the formation of all kinds of government is derived. With this view I have attempted an analyzation of the mental and corporeal faculties, in order to fhew in what manner they reciprocally influence each other in the various actions of man, not only as an individual, but as a gregarious being, impelled by nature to affociate in communities. From hence I have attempted to delineate, in what manner legiflature fprang and proceeded from its fource, through that variety of meanders, which it hath formed in its current, both before and fince the introduction of one common fign, whereby to express the intrinsic value, not only of all the productions of nature and of art, but even of the To human faculties, as they are now effimated. compare the constitutions of those different states, which have been, and are the most celebrated in ancient ancient and modern hiftory, with each other, and with that of England; and then to derive fome reafonable grounds for the determination of that which feems to be the most confentaneous with the primogenial inftitutes of nature, and the happinels of human kind. In confequence of this intent, the manners that fucceffively arofe and prevail. ed in fuch states, the benefits and mischiefs which enfued from them, are delineated, in order to explain on what foundation the welfare of national communities may most probably be established.

But from the inevitable obligations, not only of fupporting my own family, but those, also, whom, as fon and brother, it was my duty to fuftain for forty years; and which, respecting the claims of the latter, still continues, it will be eafily difcerned, that many an avocation must have proceeded from these circumstances, as well as from a sense of gratitude to his majefty, in defence of whole government, I have thought it my duty occafionally to exert my beft abilities. These truths will, I hope, offer a reafonable apology for the retardment of the publication.

In this laft defign, however, laborious and difficult as it is, I have advanced to a confiderable degree : and this manufcript I am, at all times, ready to produce as an indubitable evidence of the truth of what I declare. This work I shall now finish, with all practicable expedition. To the completion of it, I shall now confign my remaining days, yet not fo invariably, as to neglect my duty of writing in other respects. And, thank heaven! I am neither to advanced in age, or reduced by infirmities, as to create a reafonable fufpicion that I may not live longer than to finish it. Such is my answer to this injurious query; in which (27 which I am treated as a felon, who has violated the laws, by obtaining money under falle pretences.

Q. 5th, Ought you not, in common honefty, to return the money to the fubfcribers, or, in common honour, to difcharge the conditional obligation, for which you received it?---A. Undoubtedly, I ought to perform the former, if I do not execute the latter. This, I have fhewn, I have long been, and am now engaged in. No time was ever fixed, for the delivery of the books; and therefore I cannot have exceeded any engagement. And there are various inftances, of which one is very recent, that of a gentleman, who has constantly received fubscriptions, for a time much more confiderable, than that between my receiving the first subscription and this day, who has honourably difcharged the obligation. And, from a like behaviour, nothing but death shall prevent me alfo.

Q. 6th, If you do neither of these, have we any occasion to fearch the records, to prove your infamy ? must we look to the pillory, for the best whole-length picture of the man; to his public conduct, for the best miniature of his moral turpitude? --- A. What I have done, and fhall do, respecting either of these, I have already declared, in my answer to the preceding query. And, thus, you must fearch the records, to prove what you call my infamy, for it cannot be proved by what you fay. But remember, it is not the fcaffold, but the crime, that conflicutes the infamy of punishment. Take my whole-length picture from the pillory, if you like it; and the miniature, alfo, from the moral turpitude of my public conduct, as you call it: for know, that although that conduct duct were illegal, it was not immoral. Unlefs to deliver fach truths, as have never been controverted, in defence of the rights and liberties of my native country, be an immoral act. The laws, indeed, may make truth a libel; but can they alter the nature of things, and make that a moral turpitude, which as fubjects of this kingdom we ought to perform? Review this query. And, if you are fusceptible of the least fensation of an honest heart, place yourfelf, a volunteer, on the pillory; and prove, at leaft, as you are capable of the infamous act, of wantonly invading the character of an honest man; that, confcious of this moral turpitude in yourfelf, and of the libellous calumny of your queries, you can repent as well as tranfgrefs; and, by that act of morality, at once do justice to me, by doing justice on yourself.

E

Q. 7th, In case of your death, have you deputed your fon, to return the fubscribers their money? or is he to write the hiftory his father was paid beforehand for undertaking? an hiftory from yourfelf would be dull enough in all confcience : an hiltory from your fon would be a feald-milerable production indeed ! ---- A. I have, already, told you, I do not intend to die till what I propose be finished. If I do, care shall be taken respecting what you ask. And, if you chuse a farther fatisfaction, let me have the pleasure of feeing your good-natured face, and you shall receive that which shall content you. But what right, under the term Jubscriber, even with your real name annexed, can you have to treat my fon in fo illiberal a manner? or even me, unlefs you had first enquired the reasons why the history was not publifhed? had you forged a fubfcription to a draft for five pounds, you had merited a halter by the laws. But (29)

But have not you invented a new kind of forgery, more injurious than the former, by affuming that term to which you are not entitled, and which is infinitely more deferving a public punifhment? for who exifts and deferves the name of man, that does not effimate his character beyond his money! therefore altho' the laws cannot commit you to the hands of the public executioner, yet juffice would, for this unprovoked and audacious invafion of my character. But if you be a real fubfcriber, declare your name, live not beneath the guilt of fo foul a forgery, repent of the iniquitous intention to purloin that which is the immediate jewel of our fouls.

As to the merit of my writings and my fons, these shall speak for themselves. If they possess no merit, you can neither impart it, by your applause, nor, if they do, deprive them of it, by your defamation.

Q. 8th, For what did lord Bute procure you a penfion? for the punctual performance of your promise? or for the scandalous personal abuse you cast on his late majesty? if you keep your word with government no better than with your fubfcribers, administration, if they thought of purchafing your honour, were most confoundedly taken in. ——A. It was not by the means of lord Bute that my penfion was procured. At the time it was bestowed on me, Mr. Grenville was minifter. It was Sir John Philips who interefted himfelf in my favour; and, on his perfonal application to the king, his majefty was pleafed to fpeak of me in terms too favourable for me to repeat; but which I will, undeviatingly, endeavour to deferve, by allegiance and by gratitude. I fay not this, with the least intent to infinuate that I entertain the flighteft fuspicion, had his lordship been then the minister, that he would have opposed his majesty's bounty towards me. Neither have I ever united, nor will unite, in the malicious, unrelenting and unmerited purfuit of that nobleman. For, by fixing the magiltracy of the judges during life, by limiting the civil lift to 800,000l. per annum, by reducing the profusion of the houtehold expences, and by concluding a war, of which a two years farther continuance, would, in all probability, have bankrupted this nation, he proved, that he entered on the ministry with a fincere intention of ferving, and did ferve his country. But fuch was the enermous parliamentary corruption, which the whigs had begun, and cherifhed, from the revolution to his majefty's acceffion to the throne, that, had a bill been then propoled, in the commons, for their admission into the celestial manfions, the majority of them would not have given their votes, without being paid, for this falvation of their own fouls.

the

(

That peace, which his enemies have fo fcandaloufly decried, is now proved to be of infinite advantage to this kingdom. On that peace the prefent ministry have formed that act, which, according to the opinions of the most celebrated writers on the polity and government of nations, is the most just, judicious, and requilite, that a conquering flate can inflitute; fince nothing can acquire and preferve the allegiance of new jubjects, fo effectually as permitting them to remain in the fecure enjoyment of their religion and laws, the former of which was flipulated on the capitulation at Quebec. That act has not only fixed the fidelity of those Canadians to their new king; it has effablished also an ample and sufficient force to quell the democratic spirits of the American rican fectaries; in whom rebellion is as naturally inherent, as aliment in food; and who will as certainly manifeft their regicide difpofitions, on all occasions that may offer, as plants will germinate in the vernal featon. As to your ifs, they shall be answered, when you can prove there is the least ground for asking them.

(31)

Q. 9th, With what fhadow of reafon, can you complain of being treated with ill manners, in the ledger, when you have been fet upon, though not in the pillory, for abufing your fovereign, in the groffelt terms? — A. And thus, it feems, you conclude that, becaufe I have been fet on the pillory, for a libel, I have no fhadow of reafon to complain of your effrontery, when you treat me as a felon. Would it not be juft as fenfible in you to have concluded that, on having been obliged to live one day without food, I could have no fhadow of reafon to complain, if it was conftantly denied me? as to the abufe of the late king, I have already anfwered that part of your query.

Q. 10th, Inflead of reviewing the writings of other men, would not your time be more properly employed in a review of your own actions, and a preparation for the grave, to which you are now most visibly hastening?..... A. With respect to the reviewing of other men's writings, I am not now engaged in that office; nor ever was I, longer than three months : and even that was more than fix years fince. As to the reviewing of my actions, that cannot be your concern. And if your own be as detestable, as your heart is evidently black, from these queries; take the hint of reviewing and repenting of them also: left it be, otherwife, your fate never to descend to a grave of (32) debriftian burial. For, after this unprovoked debgn, in diguite to ftab my integrity, can it be a wonder, if you become a real affaffin, are hanged at Tybuin given to the furgeons for diffection; and you fkeleton exhibited in a glass cafe, with this motio, peffimorum peffimus.

Q. 11th, Will it not be very complaifant in you, to aniwer fuch of thefe queries, as relate to the fublcription money, received for your hiftory of England?——A. I have been more than very complaifant: I have anfwered all the queries. And, I flatter myfelf, to the fatisfaction of all men, that I am not the villain you would make me; and that I have proved that you deferve that deteftation which you intended to heap on me.

Such are my anfwers to the preceding queries. In thefe, he has compelled me to relate many things, which men in general would wifh to avoid, the laying before the public: but in none have I deviated from truth. And I doubt not, that the difapprobation of fo malignant and fo unprovoked an attack on my character, will prove to be the general fentiment of those who may read this answer.

As I have now both fully and candidly answered the queries which this fubicriber pronounced with fuch fignal good vature, I shall, in my turn, prefume to ask him a like number; and call on him for answers.

Query 1. Had you received the education of an apothecary, which you affect to deride, would you have talked of flyptics to beal, of bandages being fold by apothecaries, and of urinals as utenfils for women. Would not you have known that the throat does not lead into the thorax; that the thorax (33) thorax is not the flomach; and therefore does not digeft; and would not that breeding have prevented you from the difgrace of exposing yourself by such egregious ignorance?

Q. 2. How came you to conceive that affes cannot bray? are you void of all vocal utterance, or fo deaf that you cannot bear yourfelf?

Q. 3. Can your education have exceeded that of a drayman, who have miltaken the two facerdotal orders for the thirty nine articles of the church of England? are you not endowed with most confummate effrontery to accuse a man of being bred a Jacobite: you, who do not understand the difference, between de jure, and de fasto, as applied to kings? or can you be the least judge of literary performances, who have not ideas to the words you use?

Q. 4. What right, or what provocation have you to recall the punishment I suffered, or repeatedly to expose me in the Public Ledger, before the eyes of all the British subjects, as standing on the pillory, fixteen years after I had attoned for the offence?

Q. 5. Are you not the very libeller, which in me you fo much condemn? do you not deferve that punifhment, which, as you fay, is, to a vittuous character, worfe than death? have you in your queries afforded the minuteft hint that you are actuated by one fpark of virtue, fenfe, or good manners?

Q. 6. In what passages of my writings is the late king treated with foul abuse; or the revolution traduced? are you not one of that traiterous gang that is eternally infulting his present majesty with the most flagrant libels?

Q. 7.

Q. 7. Were you really a fubicriber, what plaufible motive could you have had to treat me publickly as a felon, acquiring money under falfe pretences, without having previously applied to me for answers to the subject of your queries? have you not affumed the fignature, without being a subscriber, in order to fabricate a pretext for proposing to me your illiberal queftions? will you dare to affix your name to them? if you refule it, are you not avowedly guilty of a forgery, inexpreffibly more criminal, than that of fubfcribing another man's name to a bill, with a view fraudulently to obtain money from the perfon on whom it is drawn? is not integrity more valuable than riches? in justice do you not more truly deferve to die by the hands of the common hangman, for thus endeavouring to rob me of my good name, than if you had been feized in burglarioufly breaking into my house?

Q. 8. Would not you, who have thus infidioufly laboured to ftab my reputation, have as willingly affaffinated me, could you have accomplifhed it with the like concealment and impunity?

Q. 9. Is not this act of caufelefsly invading my reputation an infamy which ought to be branded on your forehead, as a ftigma to warn mankind from affociating with fo malicious and fo black a man?

Q. 10. Ought you not to be expelled the fociety of all effimable men, as a being peftilential to the community?

Q. 11. Will it not be as complaifant in you, is it not as indifpenfably your duty to anfwer thefe queries, and to fubicribe your real name, as it was mine to anfwer yours, and affix my name to that anfwer? unlefs you comply with thefe particulars, do do you not stand self-condemned, and deferve the universal detestation of mankind?

I shall now leave you to ruminate on what I have written, and to do justice to yourself, by answering, if you can; if not to me, by a full acknowledgement of your flagitious treatment. In the mean while, I shall take this opportunity of advertissing the publishers of the ledger, and of all other papers, that I will no longer be tamely taken up by them, like an odd man, among the chairmen, when no other is at hand, to supply paragraphs of defamation, and fill the measure of their source found.

Whatever were my offence, I neither fled from the fentence of the court, nor have I, from that day to this hour, either in words or writing, attempted to afperfe the character, or arraign the juffice of that judge and jury by whom I was tried and found guilty. I knew that greater punifiments were not unprecedented : and mine I bore without complaining. I was foon convinced that nothing of a cruel or vindictive spirit possessed lord Mansfield against me. For when my life was in danger, from an ill state of health, and I applied to the court of King's-Bench, for permiffion to be carried into the rules, a few hours in the day, his lordship readily acceded to that petition. This judge Fofter pertinaceoully denied and defeated. Even fince the time when the celebrated patriot of the London livery was fentenced, but to two years imprifonment, and a fine which, to bim, was nothing, for one offence against the government, and three against religion, I neither did then, nor do I now complain of the apparent disparity of offence and infliction between us. It was his peculiar happines to be tried, found guilty, and F fentenced fentenced in the reign of our prefent fovereign, to whom his enemies have imputed even mercy as a crime.

Is it not natural to imagine that the being exposed on the pillory, three years close confinement within the walls of a prifon, together with a fine, might have been deemed a punishment adequate to the transgreffion; and fufficient to fatisfy the vindictive fpir., even of Whigs, and Prefbyterians : more efpecially, as no man among them has hitherto been able to difcover, that what I wrote, and for which I fuffered, was either falle, malicious, or feditious? Nor did it relate to the private actions of any man, but to the public and national proceedings of minifters, with which the people have a claim to be acquainted, when they are destructive of their happiness and welfare. And I may aver, with the firsteft veracity, that the letters which were written to the people of England, contributed not a little towards creating the popularity, and thereby to the elevation of lord Chatham to To him, his enemies the feat of prime minister. acknowledge this nation is indebted, for the happy change of their affairs, on his admission to the conduct of them. Why then are my endeavours, to that end, entirely buried in oblivion; my offence and my punifhment inceffantly remembered?

Even againft the difcarded minifters, who fo relentlefsly purfued me, I never have complained. Men in power, place, and profit, are naturally vindictive, and feel the lofs of them with inexpreffible referitment; and not the lefs, becaufe the allegations which are brought againft them are indifputably true. Such being the conditions of their being men, whatever were my fufferings, however feverely they were inflicted, I have, at no time, (37) time, fince the day of my commitment to prifon, written one word against them. They are now dead, and peace be to their manes.

It is lord Chatham only of whom I have reafon to complain; who having profited by my writings, and having publickly declared, that he avowed the truth of all that they contained; in return for my endeavours to ferve him, after he was mounted above the throne, and poffeffed of abfolute power, not only permitted me to be punifhed for writing words lefs offenfive than he had repeatedly fpoken in the houfe of commons; but even ill treated Sir John' Philipps, who applied to him in my favour.

Such being the true state, respecting me and my punishment, on what pretext, after the expiration of fixteen years, from the time of my offence, am I to be thus undefervedly treated by those whose talents arise not to the knowledge either of the fubject, or the language in which they write; who in ambuscade fo infidiously attack me on all occasions? why is my transgression never to be forgotten, and my punishment to know no bounds? why do they return to old transactions for new abufe; and continually expose me on the pillory for that which I have already attoned by my fufferings? for, is it not as equally a punifhment to be exposed in news-papers to the millions of my fellow-fubjects, as at Charing-Crofs, to a few hundreds? and would not these remorfeles miscreants, who thus treat my name in their publications, as readily bring me in perfon to the pillory, could it be done with equal impunity. Of fuch anonymous and abufive writers I shall henceforth take no notice; but leave them in their garrets to their lice.

But

(38)

But although thefe writers are contemptible, nameless and inscrutable, their publishers are not. And I would have these gentlemen be assured, that I will no longer be made their property of abuse : and if any thing be hereafter inferted, without the name of the writer, and their being poffeffed of fufficient evidence to prove who he is, that I will feek from them that redrefs, to which by law I am entitled; and no longer remain fupinely inattentive to fuch publications as are illegal. Full fixteen years I have been the caufeles object of their maleduction and calumny, without refentment or reply. They have now extended their malevolence to my fon. And, if they shall be still indulged in this illiberal proceeding, they may, at length, plead prefcription; and their fucceffors in icandal perfevere with impunity, not only to revile me, but all that may be defcended from me. And to this admonition I expect they will pay a due attention.

Having now done with namelefs and abufive writers, and with news-paper publifhers, I fhall embrace this occafion of conveying my fentiments to a pair of gentlemen who, in fpeeches, fince publifhed, have been pleafed to traduce me, without the leaft provocation. Thefe are two Orators, of prodigious merit, the right hon. Tommy Townfhend, and the right learned Counfellor Lee. The former of thefe is thus characterifed in the St. James's Chronicle of July the 30th, by a writer who affumes the fignature of Clio: and therefore, mufa majora canamus.

"The right honourable Thomas Townshend is one of the most respectable members that fit in the house. Though he is wanting in fluency of expression; yet the foundness of his fense, the spirit (39) of conduct, the integrity of his character, and the vehemence of his manner, render him, upon the whole, one of the most formidable members in opposition." To the integrity of his character I have nothing to object; for I know nothing of it. The foundness of his fense and the spirit of his conduct, I shall beg leave to examine. At the same time, I acknowledge the "vehemence of his manner," does render him one of the most formidable members in opposition; for, in his speaking, he seems as if he were going to bite.

Clio continues, " his eloquence, when he happens to be fluent, which he fometimes is, has a greater effect than that of any man in the house; for the fpirit, the fire, with which he attacks a minister, or a measure, is commanding : he throws his objections in the ftrongest light possible, and is unmerciful in the conclusions he draws from evil doings." A very butcher of an orator. "In his connections and speeches, he is remarkable for his true old Whiggish principles; and his abhorrence of the measures, which brought in Tories and Jacobites." Ever fince he hath been difmiffed from his places and profits. Clio proceeds, " his fpeech on the penfions, given to doctors Shebbeare and Johnson, and the countenance shewn to Sir John Dalrymple, for having vilified the memory of lord Ruffel, and the great Sydney, was a performance, which will not be foon forgiven at St. James's." Which, if it be true, is no great proof of the foundness of his fense. However, that fpeech " had prodigious merit, and was greatly received. Lord North attempted to answer it, but failed." Neverthelefs, I will undertake to attempt that in which, as Clio fays, the prime minifter milcarried. " The channel in which the patronage tronage of the prefent reign flows, is a neverfailing topic with him." He is no longer in that channel. "And he cuts it up with great fpirit, wit, and as little mercy." With much more mercy fmall as it is than fpirit, or wit, I affure you. And is not cutting up a channel molt happily metaphorical?

(40)

And now, fays Clio, " whenever a change in the ministry happens, he is expected to fill one of the higheft pofts in administration; and he will fill it with credit to himfelf, and advantage to the kingdom." From a comparison of this character with the fpeech above alluded to, and printed in the London Packet of the 18th of February, I cannot but conclude, they are the productions of the fame genius. And this character intended as an election puff, to exhibit his talents and his confequence to the university of Cambridge, of which he is the reprefentative. Be that as it may, I humbly pretume to offer a different reading of the laft paffage in his character; and to tuppofe Mr. Townshend speaking in the first person. "Whenever a change in the ministry happens, I expect to fill one of the highest posts in administration : and I will fill it with profit to mylelf, whatever the advantage may be to the kingdom."

The character being difpatched, I come now to the fpeech itfelf, of tuch prodigious merit, and fo greatly received, that lord North failed in anfwering it. It was fpoken in oppofition to a motion made in the houfe of commons, for profecuting the printers of a paper that appeared in the Public Advertifer and Morning Chronicle, of the 16th of February, figned a South Briton. "I cannot forbear, fays he, remarking, on the industry and painsemployed to paint the offence now flated to you in the most aggravated colours, when the very per-perfons, who not only condemned the revolution, which is the thing brought against the pitiful author of the libel, now before you, but who reviled the prince on the throne, and endeavoured to overturn the conflicution and the laws, are now publicly careffed and penfioned. The men I mean are, Dr. Shebbeare and Dr. Johnson. I have no perfonal knowledge of either of them; but I am well informed, that Shebbeare has a penfion, and that Johnson's has been doubled fince he wrote a certain pamphlet, in which every prince, fince the revolution, but his prefent majefty, has been most infamously and scandalously traduced. Are these then the men that are to be taken into the bosom of administration, in order to be rewarded for offences little short of treason; and is a poor wretched printer or obfcure fcribler to feel the full force of our indignation for a crime however reprehenfible in itfelf, when compared with those which I have mentioned scarcely worthy of our notice? there are fome perfons, near me, defcendants of the illustrious Ruffel; and I have myfelf, a drop of the blood of Sydney in me. I must confess, I cannot therefore fit filent and hear the referitments of this house poured upon an infignificant printer, at the inftigation of those who countenance, protect, and encourage the men who have attempted, in the most cool and deliberate manner, to revile that revolution, to which those heroes fo glorioufly paved the way."

I shall now examine into the prodigious merit of this exhibition of oratoric excellence, the found fense, and spirit of conduct of this most formidable member in the opposition, concluding that on this occasion he was fluent. There are various qualifications, both in the speaker and the speech, that that are indifpenfibly requifite to conftitute the former an orator, and the latter an oration. Among thefe, confiftency of character, truth, and fentiments coinciding, through the whole, and conducive to the fame purpofe, to fay nothing of the energy of ftyle, propriety of expression, and powers of elocution. Among the excellences of this formidable speaker, enumerated in the preceding character, this is one, "that he is remarkable for his true old whiggifh principles." And, as an evidence of this truth, he gets up, denominates the paper before them a libel against the revolution; and declares, he cannot fit filent, and hear the refertments of the house poured upon an infignificant printer, who, as he allows, had publifted a libel against the revolution. This, I apprehend, is the very perfection of confistency; an old whig ftyles a paper before him, a libel against the revolution. He then harangues in favour of the perfons who printed this libel, with intent to avert the indignation of the house; and this because he cannot fit filent and hear the refertment of that house, from men who countenance and protect those who have reviled the revolution. And yet, this countenance and protection is that very transgreffion which he himfelf is at that moment committing, in defence of the printer, who he himfelf has denominated to be a like reviler of that revolution. Does not this fpirited conduct, and confiftency of principle, evince the foundness of his fente, and confirm "that there is fomething in his character very firiking?"

Let me now enquire into his reasons for speaking on this occasion. And these are, "that he cannot forbear remarking, on the industry and pains employed to paint the offence now stated in the most ag-

This paffage, I am appreaggravated colours." henfive, contains fome particulars, that neither Arittotle, nor Quintilian have enumerated among those qualities in an oration, that pronounce a man to be a most respectable speaker. Do painters state an offence, or orators paint a state of it? and if they do, should it not be in the most aggravated colouring, to preferve the metaphor, and make it confittent with common fenfe and common Englifh ? will this pafs mutter at Cambridge ?

Having, in this manner, given his reasons for remarking on the industry and pains of painting a ftated offence, he now proceeds to deliver those, which are full as good, for averting the indignation of the house from the author or publisher of the paper, which he denominates a libel. And these are the pitifulness of the obscure scribler, and the poverty and wretchedness of the printer. Now, unless this orator be acquainted with this obfcure fcribler, by what means does he know that he is a pitiful author? it is true, indeed, if he beltow that epithet on him, on account of the manner in which that paper is written, the author of it is pitiful enough. And if we may determine from the (peaking of an orator, what will prove to be the pitifulnels of his writing, and that characteristic is to be received as his protection from punishment, the right honourable gentleman may fafely commence his written libels, whenever he will, and defy the indignation of the house. At the same time, it may not prove to be an evidence of the foundnefs of his fense, absolutely to confide in that pitifulnefs for his fecurity. Because, I apprehend, the law does not pay fo much attention to the pitifulnefs of the performance, as to the malicioufnefs and mischief of the intention in the writer. And then, if he be as vehement and as contemptible in in writing, as he is in fpeaking, he may chance to be as much derided as an author, as he is as an orator, and to be punifhed for putting on paper, thofe very words, which, in the houfe, he fpeaks with impunity. For it feems the good manners and liberty of fpeech, allowable in that place, make that inoffenfive, which the law condemns as a libel in all others. So much would not have been faid on this head, had the author of the South Briton been known.

G

With relation to the printers, I fincerely wifh their poornels and wretchednels may tend to alleviate their sentence. For it would seem to be hard for them to fuffer greatly for printing fo pitiful a performance. I hope, therefore, their punishment may prove as lenient as the laws can allow, and mercy dictate. For it uniformly appears that the feverity of infliction, in such cates, like burning at a stake for herefy, rather increales the number of converts, than intimidates from transgreffion. And as these pitiful scriblers against government, have either already committed, or are in the actual commiflion of a literary felf-murder, I could with to fee them proceed with as little interruption as polfible, till, by their writings, they render themfelves incapable of making converts, to their caufe; and expire by their own handy work; and in that manner put an end to writing and printing fuch miserable productions.

There is yet another realon which this right honourable speaker is pleased to offer, in order to avert the indignation of the house of commons. It is that "Johnson and Shebbeare are now publickly carefied and pensioned, who have not only condemned the revolution, but have reviled the prince on the throne; have endeavoured to overturn the constitution and the laws; and committed offences (45) offences little fhort of treafon." Now I do not perceive, why this moft respectable orator fhould be fo vehemently declamatory; nor on what he can ground his malediction of the minittry, for penfioning Dr. Johnfon and myfelf; fince we have done, if he may be credited, the fame things only for which he is labouring to obtain an alleviation of refentment against the printers of the South Briton? if to obfcure a fcribler, deferve to efcape from punishment, for fo pitiful a performance, does it not logically follow, that we ought to be rewarded for having executed fuch magnificent undertakings in the same way?

However, neither Dr. Johnfon nor myfelf fhall prefume to avail ourfelves of this argument. On the contrary, we defy this moft refpectable member of found fenfe to adduce one initiance, in proof, that either of us hath endeavoured to overturn the conflictution and the laws, hath written a word againft the revolution, againft the religion of our country, or even to the prejudice of morality and good manners. And, if we had approached as nearly to treaton as he has to falfehood, in this charge againft us, I am afraid we fhould deferve as much to be put to death for what we have written, as he does, not to be credited for what he hath fpoken, and then the Lord have mercy upon us.

But he fays, "we have reviled the prince on the throne." According to the context with the preceding part of the fentence, which mentions the revolution, this prince on the throne muft be king William, who was dead ten years before either of us was born. And this feems to make it fomewhat difficult to reconcile that paffage with common fenfe. Since it cannot be king William, it must be his present majesty, who is the prince on the throne, whom we have reviled. But this fupposition cannot serve him either; because he declares, that Dr. Johnson hath traduced every prince fince the revolution, except his majefty : and of that offence, respecting me, he fays nothing. But, confidering the prodigious merits of this fpeech, although the orator except his majefty, I am not perfectly convinced that he does not mean him. Now, unlefs this formidable member will explain in what manner we reviled king William on the throne, who was dead before we were born; or how we can have reviled the prince on the throne, and yet not have reviled his present majesty, which he allows we have not, I shall never enjoy found fense enough to comprehend it. And if an explanation be attempted, it must come from him, or no. attention will be paid to it. This I defire to have confidered, not only as an inftance of his adherence to truth, but of his confistency in matter alfo.

muit

(

The orator rifes in fublimity, and fpeaking of the libel, as he calls it, by way of foftening the indignation of the house, he fays, "a crime, however reprehensible in itself, when compared with those, which he has now mentioned, scarcely worthy of their notice." These words are too elevated, for the reach of my comprehension. I do not conceive in what manner a crime can be, however, or in whatever degree, reprehensible, and neverthelefs, by comparison with another, become fcarcely worthy of notice. Suppole, for example, the degree of criminality had mounted to treaton, which is one among the bowevers, would it have been reduced to a degree unworthy of notice, on being compared with those of Dr. Johnson and myfelf? which latter, as this most formidable member ber has the goodnefs to grant, are "a little fhort of treafon?" might it not as juftly be faid, in whatever degree a cloth be black, the blackeft, for example, that it is fcarcely black, when compared with another, that is not quite fo black? and then the unmerciful conclution muft logically be, that the piece lefs black, is blacker than the blackeft.

(47)

This right honourable and most respectable member, however, difclaims, " all perfonal knowledge of either of us." For myfelf, I affure him, that the foundness of his sense, his prodigious merit, and his adherence to truth, have not created in me the leaft defire of being better acquainted with him. He then fays, "he is well informed I have a penfion." And for once he is not mistaken. "And that Dr. Johnson's has been doubled fince he wrote the pamphlet," above alluded to. I wish he may be as well informed in that particular as in the preceding. And that fome one could truly inform him also, that mine will be doubled, for writing this pamplet. And in return, let the foundness of his sense, the vehemence of his manner, and the formidablenefs of his oppofition be trebled. Let him let loofe his malediction, with its best fluency, on me, and I shall not be apprehensive of being overwhelmed by that torrent. At length, he alks this question. " Are these then the men that are to be taken into the bosom of administration, in order to be rewarded?" Whether Dr. Johnson be taken into that bosom or not, I know not; but as his pension is doubled, I expect lord North will take me into the breeches pecket of administration, and that shall content me.

I am now come to that fplendid Apoftrophe, intended for Sir John Dalrymple, which, it feems, will 48) will not foon be forgiven at St. James's. " There are, fays he, some perfons near me, descendants of the illustrious Sydney, and I have myfelf a drop of the Ruffel blood in me." And what do thefe two wonderful circumstances produce in him? they fend him to confession. "I confess, fays he, I cannot therefore, fit filent and hear the refentment of this house poured upon an infignificant printer, at the inftigation of those who countenance, protect and encourage the men, who have attempted, in the most cool and deliberate manner, to revile that revolution to which those heroes to glorioufly paved the way." He cannot fit filent and hear the refentments of the houfe poured on an infignificant printer; but he must exert his oratory in his favour; becaufe the ministry, I suppose, have countenanced, protected and encouraged Sir John Dalrymple, who has attempted to revile that revolution, to which those heroes fo gloriously paved the way. And thus this local proximity of Ruffel defcendants, and one drop of Sydney blood, have compelled him into an abfurdity unexampled. He hath poured forth his vehemence against the ministry, for their countenance of one who has only attempted to revile the revolution, in favour of another, who as he has acknowledged, hath actually reviled that very revolution, in a libel before them. I take the force of argument, and the unmercifulness of the conclusion to be extremely transcendant in this inflance.

But there is yet another circumftance fingularly remarkable in this paffage. This member of found fenfe, is miftaken in the matter of fact. For Sir John Dalrymple hath not attempted to revile the revolution, nor to defame those heroes, who may as juftly be faid to have gloriously paved the way to the new Jerufalem, as to the revolution. But let Sir

Sir John defend himfelf, respecting his treatment of the revolution. As to Ruffel and Sydney, he ftands forth, in his Memoirs, their confpicuous panegyrift. It must be allowed, indeed, that he has adopted a new mode of verifying facts in hiftory, by bringing indifputable authorities to difprove the truth of them. And now I would advife this formidable orator to let that drop of Sydney blood out of his veins, if it have not already corrupted the whole mafs. ---- "It is a general rule, fays Mr. Bayes, that you must ever make a simile when you are furprifed." Now, as I am doubly furprifed, on this occasion, before I proceed to offer my reations, for advising this most formidable member in opposition to let out this Sydney drop, I shall explain the two surprizes, and then bring two fimiles.

First furprize. That an orator fo respectable, of fuch found sense, so formidable in opposition to the ministry, with all the other great talents and qualifications mentioned in his character, should make fuch a speech as the preceding.

Second furprize. That any man, who had heard that fpeech, could have conceived the orator to be a perfon of fuch prodigious merit, fpirit, wit, eloquence, &c. even when he is fluent.

These fingular phænomena may receive a full explanation, by the sole circumstance of supposing the speaker and the panegyrist to be the same perfon; and then the superizes cease. However that may be, I am nevertheless resolved that my readers and the right honourable gentleman shall have the two similes.

First simile. If you put a calf's head in a pot and fet it on the fire, with the cover on, you will find, by degrees, that the heat below raises the fcum fcum to the furface, fets the pot a boiling, and drives that fcum, with a blubbering impetuofity, which ftruggles for an explosion, between the pot-lid and the pot; then thick and filthy it creeps down the footy fides of it. In this cafe, the formidableness arifes from the danger of being fcalded, if we approach too near the vehemence of the fpluttering utenfil. This I take to be a pretty exact refemblance of the unmerciful orator, when he is not fluent.

Second fimile. If you place a barrel of new fmall beer on a dray, by the agitation of the vehicle, the fermentation vaftly encreafes, the dregs rife to the top, and the vehemence of the working will fplit the cafk, unlefs you open the vent; then out fprings the foaming, turbid, fpiritlefs liquor, rifes prodigioufly into the fublime, exhaufts its frifky force, and on the veffel's fides flows fwiftly down. In this cafe, the formidablenefs arifes from the danger of being horridly befpattered if you approach too near the cafk. This I take to be the true refemblance of this refpectable orator, when he is fluent.

When the colonel, in the Committee, bids Teague to carry a meffage to Mrs. Day, who had been his father's cook-maid, the Irifhman tells his mafter that, on the fight of her, the pots and the fpits will come into his head, and the laugh upon his face, againft which the colonel gives him the ftrongeft injunction. In like mainner, when this unmerciful orator fhall again harangue the houfe, I warn the commons neither to let the pot nor the fmall beer barrel to come into their beads, nor the laugh on their faces : But to behave with all due decorum to fo refpetTable a member.

And

(5I)

And now, having answered this speaker, of old whiggish principles, of sound tense, spirited conduct, vehement manner, and formidableness in opposition; of striking character, the ready advocate for enlarged and general measures; and the patron of madhouses; I must acknowledge in the last he affords a striking instance of disinterestedness; since, from thence, he has no advantage to expect, being in no more danger of losing his understanding, than a perion is of being robbed, who has nothing to lose.

Clamabit vacuus coram dostore orator.

Befides the preceding excellences, he is the foul of opposition; has great eloquence, when he is fluent; more effectual, fiery, spirited and commanding, in attacking a minister, than any man; he is an unmerciful old Whig, and abhorrer of Tories and Jacobites; an orator of prodigious merit, great spirit, wit, and as little mercy; whom lord North attempted to answer, but failed. Such, and fo formidable being the man, whom I have engaged, I shall, in imitation of Sir John Falftaffe, to the prince of Wales, after he had killed a dead Percy, prefume to tell his lordship, "that if he do me justice so; if not, let him demolish the next unmerciful Tommy Townshend himself. I look either to have my penfion doubled, or a good place, I can affure him."

Having difpatched my animadversions, furprizes, and fimiles, I shall now proceed to affign my reafons for advising the right honourable orator to let that drop of Sydney blood out of his veins. And to this intent, I shall endeavour to give a faithful portrait of this glorious hero, Algernon Sydney; a drop of whose facred blood, like a faith's relique, is fo much adored by him. And first, of his political principles, in civil inftitutions. * He was a zealous republican, who upheld the magistracy, and the ministry, without a fingle person, kingfhip, or house of lords. In his religious establishment, he was averfe from the church of England, her doctrines, discipline, rites and ceremonies; an enemy to episcopacy, and to all degrees of dignity in ecclesiaftical polity. As a necessary con-fequence of these principles, he was an avowed enemy to the constitution of this kingdom, which the orator not only effects to admire and efteem, but to abhor those also, who, as he fays, have endeavoured to overturn it. He held that kings were the truftees of, and derived their authority from the people; that the people are the fole judges of their regal government; have a right to take arms; to dethrone their fovereigns, to change the conftitution both in church and flate; and that the king, being a politic perfon, unlefs he be deftroyed in his natural capacity, it is not high treafon.

15

In obedience to thefe principles, he took arms, and engaged in the grand rebellion againft Charles the firft; in which it does not appear that he fignalized himfelf by any confpicuous action. He was zealous and active, in all the prepofterous changes, ecclefiaftical and civil, of thefe times, till Cromwell affumed the fole government of the kingdom; and he vehemently oppofed Richard, after Oliver's death. At this time, unaltered in opinion, by the long experience of that anarchy and defpotifm, which lubfifted under the various forms that government received, and which demonftrated the madnefs of expecting liberty from principles ciples fo abfurd and impracticable. Inftigated by the fame pertinaciousness of democratic fury, and prefbyterian fanaticism, he united with Praisegod Barebones, and his rump, under a folemn obligation to accomplish the exclusion of kings, protectors, nobles and the church of England.

· Life of Sydney, p. 5, his discourses, passim.

(53)

At the reftoration, he was excepted amongst the regicides, as a man incompatible by his hatred to the conflitution, and as irreconcileable to a king in allegiance by any acts of kindnefs. On his folicitation to Henry Saville, ambaffador in France, to interfere in procuring him liberty to return to England, he was fuffered to revisit his native land; and obtained his pardon from Charles the fecond. Notwithstanding this act of mercy, in the king, and without his having performed a fingle act, during his exile, which might merit this forgivenefs, he immediately became a traitor to that very prince; and an agent of the king of France, in order to promote the defigns of that monarch, and to oppose those of his lawful fovereign. And to this flagitious purpose he was purchased by a pension, paid him by Barillon, the French ambaffador at the court of England. This treachery, which was fulpected during his life, hath been lately verified by indifputable authorities, taken from the letters of Barillon, preferved in the proper place of depoliting fuch records in France. And in a letter of Sydney to Henry Saville, who, like him, was a republican, and a traitor to his matter, it is fo far confirmed as to shew, that both Sydney and Saville were fecretly intriguing with the French court, against their sovereign : for in that letter he fays, *" you know Monsieur de Barillon governs us if, be be not mistaken." Let the man who glories in H 2 having having one drop of Sydney blood in him, explain this pairing to any purpole but the former, if he can.

• Sydney's letter to Saville, p. 45.

Not fatisfied with this treachery and ingratitude to the king, whole lawful authority he acknowledged, by accepting pardon and life from his hands, he, with the lords Shaftsbury, Russel, and others, became the patrons and abettors of the enormous perjuries of Titus Oates, respecting a Popifh plot against the king's life. The most groundlefs, malicious, and inhuman machination, that ever villains invented or supported. By this infernal fiction not lefs than twenty men, entirely innocent of the charge, perished by the hands of the public executioner; among whom was the aged and virtuous lord Stafford. This nefarioulnels being accomplifhed, Sydney, with the lords Ruffel, Effex, Howard, Grey, together with Sir Thomas Armftrong, Ferguion the Prefbyterian teacher, Rumfey, Rumbold, Nelthorpe, Wade, Goodenough, Walcot, Thomson, Burton Hone, and a few more, prefumed themfelves to be the people of England; pronounced that the king had, by his maladministration, forfeited his right to reign; and therefore, that it was lawful to dethrone him by any means whatever. And, with that intent, they entered into a confpiracy to take arms, and to affaffinate their fovereign. Such were the natural effects of those principles which these men efpoufed. And is there not fomething fimilar that feems to prevail, at prefent? do not the aldermen Wilkes, Crofby, Bull, and Sir Watkin Lewes, together with the bill of rights men; the aldermen Sawbridge, Townshend, Oliver, Cathatine Macauley, and the conftitutional fociety; together with a majority of the common-council, the livery of London, and the mob of Newcastle, the 55)

the men of tender conficience, and the Antiarticularians of the Feathers Tavern, prefume to be the whole people of England at this day? and as their principles are the fame with republicans and regicides, is it not neceffary to be watchful of their actions?

The plot being discovered, Sydney was apprehended, tried, found guilty, and beheaded. And although the law may have been unjustly strained, in converting the papers, which were found in his closet, to a second evidence against him, because this proof, the crime of high treason undoubtedly demands: and which can never be violated, but by the outrage of an unmerciful and unjust judge. And altho' Sydney were not lawfully put to death, yet is there a man, now living, who believes he was not engaged in this confpiracy, to take away the life of that king, who gave bim his, and therefore that he deferved his fate? perfons of upright hearts will most certainly condemn and detest the magistrate; but can that violence, on one fide, exculpate the criminality on the other? was Sydney in fact the more to be pitied as a traitor, becaufe he fuffered by the fentence of the unjust and cruel Jefferies? And permit me to afk, that, fince no argument can palliate this illegal execution, even of a guilty man, what have the Whigs of king William's reign to offer in their excule, who, through deficiency of a fecond witnefs, made an express law of attainder, to put Sir John Fenwick to death; against whom nothing can be faid, that will not be equally applicable to Algernon Sydney.

Such was this heroic Sydney, by principle, a republican; by practice, a rebel; by intention, a regicide; and, in all, a fanatic vilionary. His doctrine, respecting the right of the people to oppose their sovereigns in arms, to judge, depose, and and put them to death, if they be fultainable in any state; and on the utmost emergencies; are fuch as are the most causelessly promulged in this For, by this constitution, the minister king.iom. is answerable for the conduct of public affairs, the people have their representatives, and they are, by their duty and their office, obliged to superintend the administration of the realm. They are the grand inquest of the kingdom, and bound to impeach the perpetrators of national milchief. The lords are the highest court of justice, before whom ministerial offenders are legally to be brought: and it is their duty to try, to acquit, or to find them And laftly, the king has the power of life guilty. and death, to pardon or to confirm the fentence.

Hence it is evident, that, in all cafes of public malversation, the people have, at first, a right only to apply to their reprefentatives for redrets of grievances. If they neglect their duty, it is against them, who are their fervants, that refentment ought to be exerted. But if thele impeach the minister, before the house of lords, and the latter refuse or evade the claims of justice; it is against them the people have then their right of manifesting their indignation. If this high tribunal acquit the impeached minister, there the affair mult legally reft. If they find him guilty, and the king refuse to fign his sentence, or pardon him unmeriting it; then, and then only, the people can claim the leaft right of appealing to their fovereign, in fearch of juffice; when if it be refuted, and the caufe be worthy of fuch purfuit, they may feek redrefs by those means which God has given them.

But in all fuch cafes, nothing but a certain majority of the people can properly apply to their representatives; and a majority of their representatives to the house of lords; a denial of justice, on their part, can alone vindicate the people in seeking from them redress; and then on that of the sovereign, before the people can justifiably take arms against him.

to

57)

(

And now we can alcertain by what means that hero, fo glorioully paved the way to the revolution. By rebelling against Charles the first; subverting the conflictation in church and flate; and approving the murder of that fovereign. By engaging with the rump parliament, to govern without a king or house of lords. By becoming the pensioned traitor of Lewis the fourteenth; and entering into a confpiracy against the life of that king, who had given him bis. By being tried, found guilty, and executed for rebellion. Such is the hero and coufin of the refuectable member; fuch are the deeds for which he stiles him glorious. And these, I fhould think, can form but a fourvy pavement to the revolution. Are there the true old 'whiggifh principles also, for which he is remarkable? and let me tell this coufin Tommy, that his hero teems to have entertained no favourable opinion, either of the intentions or abilities of King William. For, in a letter to Saville, p. 46, he fays, "I long fince found that the defign of fending H. Sydney into Holland, was like the reft of Sir William Temple's projects; a matter of great depth, and kept to close, that not one of them would speak to me of it; but this day was a fe'ennight, a gentleman that came to fee me, took a letter out of his pocker, newly come from Holland, wherein the whole end of his negotiation is fet out very plainly; which, in fhort, is underftood to be no more, than under a pretence of a guaranty, to draw Holland and Spain into a league with England; which may help help the prince of Orange with an occasion of breaking the peace lately made; which, I believe, will take effect, if the French can be perfuaded to fleep three months, and take no notice of it; if the Lovestein party, in Holland, and their affociates, can be brought to believe the prince of Orange thinks of advancing no interest but the public good of his country, and if our house of commons can be fo well fatisfied with the management of the left bufine/s in Flanders, as to be willing to raife a new army, under the fame conduct; and to believe one that is fo raifed, will conduce to the defence of Flanders as much as the laft."

From this opinion of the prince of Orange, conjoined with the democratic fanaticifm of Sydney, does it not appear extremely probable, that if he intended to pave the way to a revolution, it was of a different kind from that of placing king William on the throne of these realms? for such was the temper of all those implacable contenders for liberty, that, when once they had rifen above the lawful authority of the king, by the arms of an infatuated populace, they never imagined themfelvesin real liberty, till those very people were subdued to an impracticability of oppoling them. In this manner, these searchers of the lord and liberty, obtained an ascendant over one another, as the prefbyterian and the independent rebels occafionally prevailed, till absolute power, in order to obtain an absolute freedom, for himself alone, centered in Oliver Cromwel; and that the foul of Sydney was of the fame form is evidently feen in Thurloe's memoirs, Such was the heroic Algernon, one drop of whofe blood the unmerciful Tommy Townshend fo much efteems. On this account, will not that right honourable gentleman exhibit a flronger indication bf of found fense and spirited conduct, in letting out, than preferving, that rebellious drop? and when he charged Dr. Johnson and me with endeavouring to overturn the conftitution, and the laws; and with offences little short of treason; did he not deviate into the most flagrant inconsistency, to value his confanguinity with Algernon Sydney, whom he denominates a glorious hero, for having perpetrated crimes egregiously more enormous than those of which he fallely accules us? does this abfurdity, in that formidable orator, fpring from fhare ignorance? or from what motive, whilft he is labouring to represent us to be little less than traitors, does he effimate himfelf to highly for his alliance with Algernon Sydney, than whom no hiftory has yet produced a more fanguinary and ungrateful traitor; not to his fovereigns only, but to the conflictation of his country alfo? does not this condemnation of Dr. Johnson and myself originate in his bosom, becaufe we have shewen our allegiance and duty to his prefent majefty, by our writings; and the fenfelels effusion of his panegyric proceed from the like principles, which actuated the rebel heart of his heroic coufin Sydney?

59)

(

I have now done with this most respectable member, and his Sydney drop. I fhall now proceed to examine the speech of counfellor Lee, a gentleman in whom the niceft ballance cannot determine whether modefty or argument do most preponderate. This fpeech was inferted in the Public Ledger, the 12th of July, and delivered on the trial of the printers for that very paper which engendered that very speech of prodigious merit, which bluftered from the oratoric lips of the formidable speaker, already mentioned. We all know that a dog will return to his own vomit, but not

(60)

not to that of another. On this occasion, this learned and modeft advocate returns to lick up the filthy fcum, or foaming muddy and fpiritless fmall beer that fell from the most respectable orator, and fpews it out once more in defence of the fame printers, in a fecond speech of equally prodigious Among others, he is pleafed to favour me merit. with one fhort paffage of his matchlefs harangue. "Such a tellow as Shebbeare, after großly traducing the most illustrious character of the age, and reviling in almost direct terms, the revolution, he we find rewarded with a penfion." Now I am really at a lofs, to comprehend whom he intends by that defcription of the most illustrious chacatter of the age: and, therefore, until he shall be pleafed to name the perfon, and prove him to be that illustrious character, I shall not attempt to vindicate myfelf from the charge of traducing him. But what fuch a fellow as Lee can mean, by my reviling, in almost direct terms, the revolution, I cannot comprehend: becaufe, in the fixth letter to the people of England, for which I fuffered, it is faid of the revolution, "I must recur to these times, when James the fecond was exiled from thefe realms: it will be neceffary to remind you, what were the honourable dispositions of English men, the happy flate and condition of your commerce and taxes at that hour. At that time, the love of liberty and their conftitution truely animated the natives of England to oppose the usurpation of unlawful power in the lovereign and his ministers: then it was that zeal for the eftablifhed faith, infpired your bifhops to refift every attempt upon your religion : then it was you were a brave and honourable people: then it was that two millions supplied the annual expences in time of

of war: then it was you paid only four shillings taxes in every twenty, which you fpent, which are now rifen to fourteen. Such was your blifsful state when James was driven hence, and William and Mary mounted the throne of their father, and of these realms: a situation, which no other state in Europe could poffels; because not bleffed with fuch natural advantages." And now I appeal to the world, whether Tommy Townshend and such a fellow as Lee, have not afferted a whole falfehood, when they fay, "I have reviled, in almost direct terms, the revolution?"

It is true, indeed, if these orators mean by the revolution, the mifchiefs that were produced by thole ministers who engaged this nation in an expenfive and unfuccefsful war, to support the interests of the Dutch; who spread universal corruption through the parliament; purchased the members to exhaust the treasure, and lavish the blood of their fellow-fubjects, encreafed their taxes, railed the prices of the neceffaries of life, and mercilefsly mortgaged them and their posterity for the payment of those immense fums which they fquandered for alien interests, and to enrich themfelves; then, indeed, that fellow Lee might have left out his almost. And if exposing such enormous iniquities be reviling the revolution, I have reviled it, and glory in that act.

There are, in Italy, a set of men, known by the name of banditti, who feem to poffes a drop of the Sydney blood, and to be actuated by whiggifh principles. Their occupation confilts in robberies, and murder, and they claim the right of perpetrating fuch execrable actions under the name of liberty of confcience. Whenever it happens that these formidable and unmerciful gentlemen tlemen of prodigious merit are discovered, and in danger of being apprehended, they fly to that church for a fanctuary, whofe holy ordinances they have conftantly violated, and into which they have never entered, but for the lake of committing facrilege, till that moment of feeking fafety from the hands of public justice. In like manner, this fellow Lee and others who have been educated in whiggift principles, and all those practices which have fucceeded the expulsion of James the fecond, fly to the revolution, as to an afylum from the deteftation which attends their mifdeeds; and thank God for having been bred in fuch principles, as never can legitimately produce fuch practices as they purfue: and thus they would fanctify themfelves by a word inapplicable to them and their actions, without a violation of every idea that originally attended it, and hardily hold up their faces against truth itfelf. So much for the modefty of Mr. Lee; I fhall now proceed to the argumentative part of his speech, in defence of his clients. It is that because I receive a pension, the printers were to elcape conviction. If this could have answered that purpole, I should have had no objection to it. But ought not that learned advocate to have reflected before he selected this argument from Tommy the orator, that whilft he was bringing me as a penfioner, before the court, which as he was not pleading for a pension for his client, did not promile to be of much fervice to his caufe; he must inevitably recall me as a perfon that had been punished for a libel, from which accusation it was his duty to defend his client. By that fingular and useful mode of defence, did he not produce a precedent that operated in diametrical opposition to that end, to which his rhetoric fhould have folely tended?

I 2

(63)

tended ? a confiftency of arguing which he has imitated also from the respectable Tommy Townshend.

Mr. Lee now rifes to the very fummit of the fublime, and gives us an inftance of his oratoric powers, such as is not to be found either in Longinus, or Mr. Burke. "Ruffel, Sydney, and other ornaments of human nature, have not escaped the traductory malice of a libeller. In a book called Memoirs of Great Britain, they are most outrageoufly defamed." I have already fhewn what an amazing ornament Sydney was to human nature. From this vehement effusion of ill-timed panegyric in Mr. Lee; may not the world be inclined to conclude, either that his whole body is filled with Sydney blood; or his whole foul with fimilar principles? which, if it be, may their fimilitude be continued to the end, and his exit like that of him whom he fo rapturoufly pronounces to be an ornament to human nature; the most certain way in which this gentleman can be exalted to a like diffinction among posterity.

Mr. Lee continues. "Not that I blame an hiftorian for laying facts before his readers, but I blame him for prejudging a caufe by preliminary remarks of his own; yet this is the cafe of the compiler of the book in queftion; he prefaces his anecdotes with a prejudication of characters; and he fays, that when the force of truth compelled him to prejudge them, he felt as a father would do whofe fon had cowardly turned his back in the day of battle."

Now it fo happens, that in all this prodigious explosion of rhetorical referitment against Dalrymple, there is not one fyllable of truth. 1st, That writer, in his Memoirs, is fo far from being a traductory or malicious libeller, who has most out-outrageously defamed both Russel and Sydney, that he has adopted the opinion of Whigs and Prefbyterians, and is manifeftly the encomiast of those two men. 2d, The words which Mr. Lee recites are not those of the historian. These are, "when I found in the French difpatches lord Ruffel, intriguing with the court of Verfailles; and Algernon Sydney taking money from it, I felt very near the fame shock, as if I had seen a son turn his back in the day of battle." Where then are the preliminary remarks of prejudging? where does he fay the force of truth compelled him to prejudge? 3d, Thefe preliminary were posterior remarks, and were not printed in a preface to the memoirs; and therefore could be no prejudication of the characters, unless that which follows precedes the thing which it fucceeds. They were printed in a preface to the fecond volume, containing a collection of state papers, including indubitable facts, two years after the memoirs had been published. And thus it happens that the cafe, which Mr. Lee blames, has no exiftence; and that, which he approves, is the real cafe. To what then is this truthlefs exhibition of Mr. Lee to be attributed? to his modeft affurance, which incontinently prompts him to utter every kind of defamation against those whom he pleases to traduce? to his ignorance, which precludes him from the understanding of what he reads, which has miftaken the true flate for the falle, the preface of the fecond volume, for that of the first; and put that in the front which follows in the rear? or to his love of veracity, which uniformly inclines him to represent things as they are not? it must be allowed, however, that in the act of speaking great words, to no purpole, this gentleman tleman has exhibited a specimen of prodigious merit.

65)

Mr. Lee perfeveres. "But we fee no notice taken, no complaint made of a book wherein the characters of men, hitherto deemed an honour to their country, are traduced and villified; their defunct manes are impiously infulted, their living descendants are basely dishonoured." What notice Mr. Lee would have had taken, or complaint made against a book, which contains nothing but the most authentic documents of truth, he may explain if he can. And if the characters of those he mentions have hitherto been deemed an honour to their country, it has been by rebels, regicides, republicans, Whigs, Prefbyterians, and fuch fellows as Lee. And, according to that orator, it is an impious infult on their defunct manes to prove, that Sydney was a rebel, a regicide of one king, a fubverter of the conflitution, a penfioned traitor of France, and a configurator against the life of another king, who gave that Sydney the privilege of living in his native country. What a bleffed idea of impiousness is generated in the conceptions of this advocate and his affociates! and if their heroes be traduced and villified, it is not by Sir John Dairymple, but by truth herfelf; if fuch calumny be applicable to what the delivers. And if their living descendants be dishonoured, it is by the demerits only of their dead anceftors.

But this illuftrious advocate is even more unmerciful than the formidable Tommy Townfhend. For he has put to death that which never dies. The manes of Ruffel and Sydney are defunct. The foul which furvives the body is dead. This is, indeed, an infliction on these two herces; most unmerciful, indeed, Counsellor Lee has flain immortality (66)

 \mathbf{r}_{i} with vitelf, and put the very fouls of Ruffel are Syndey to death; a cruelty as much beyond that with which they were bodily inflicted, as the deprivation of a life for a few years is inferior to that of eternity.

Mr. Lee now tells us, "that, fince his advance to riper years, he had well weighed the matter, and could not help looking upon William and Mary as princes endowed with every public virtue, which could render them deferving of a throne; and every private virtue which should endear them to their fubjects." I have no inclination to alter this manner of thinking, in this admirable orator : notwithftanding which, I shall prefume to declare that, be their virtues ever fo great, the fame virtues are to be as justly attributed to his prefent majefty and his queen. And I would gladly know from what motives this ardent allegiance to dead kings, and fuch malevolent invectives heaped on me for having, as they fay, reviled them, can proceed. On what account, their former fovereigns are fo extolled, and I am conftantly brought back to punishment? but such is the truth, these violences are not committed on me, because I have traduced dead fovereigns, as they affert; but becaufe I will not revile the living. From this fource fprings. that ftream of calumny which they have turned in upon me. Had I continued the libeller they report me, their approbation would then be equal to their prefent flander; I might have received the glorious appellation of a patriot; and have been an illustrious chairman at the bill of rights. But let me be exposed a thousand times on the pillory, and fent to prilon, for fuch deeds as I have already fuffered, rather than be doomed to the principles of fuch men, men, and to prefiding in their chair; for this would be infamy indellible.

Counfellor Lee has, indeed, given us his opinion of the princes, William and Mary, without favouring the public with his reasons for adopting I have given mine, alfo, respecting his present It. majefty, and his royal confort. I will not reft my fentiments on affertion, but prefume to compare the public and the private virtues of the princes, on the throne, with those of the former pair, and leave the world to determine, in whom they are the most exalted; and whether I be not as perfectly justified, in this sentiment, as Mr. Lee and all his confederates of fimilar education and principles can be in theirs. With this view, I shall begin with those transactions which have been imputed to his majefty as criminally administered, expose the futility and fallehood of fuch imputations; bring inftances of fimilar events, in the reign of king William, and then defy Tommy Townshend, Lee, and all of old whiggifh principles to refute what I shall deliver, or to suggest that their present majesties are not as justly entitled to the encomium of public and of private virtues, as those princes whom they fo much extol.

1. The first imputation of offence, in his majefty, is that of favouritism to lord Bute. That nobleman was born a British subject. By that birth, he is equally entitled, with all others, to diffinctions in post and place. By his conduct, near his majesty, when prince of Wales, he acquired his effect and affection, and received the effects of them, when the crown devolved on his head. This favourite received no diffinctive marks from his fovereign beyond that of the order of the garter, and a peerage for his lady.

K

1. Let

1. Let me now thew the effects of favouritifm. in the reign of king William. Bentinck, a foreigner, was railed from being a gentleman of the bed-chamber to the prince of Orange, to an earl and marquis of England. He was prefented with five parts in fix of the whole county of Denbeigh, with 135,820 acres of the forfeited eftates in Ireland; with large donations of land in England, and was, in fact, the fole minister. Keppel, another favourite, a Dutchman, and page to the king, was made earl of Albemarle, honoured with the order of the garter, and prefented with 108,633 acres of the Irifh forfeitures. Ginckle, a Dutchman, was created earl of Athlone. Rouvigny, a These were pre-French refugee, earl of Galway. fented with portions of the fame lands; the former with 26,480, and the latter with 36,148 acres. Elizabeth Villiers, a female favourite, was made countels of Orkney, and prefented with 95,649 acres of king James's private eftate in Ireland, of the yearly income of 25,9951. On these, and a few others, were beitowed, in acres, 1,060,792, -in rent, 211,223/. - in value, clear of all incumbrances, 1,699,3431. Such was the account delivered into parliament, by the commissioners, who were fent to examine into that affair, previous to the refumption, and as ratified by the houle of commons,

2. Lord Bute was inhumanly abufed for making, and his majefty for figning the laft treaty of peace with France. And yet, at this time, the expences of the laft year amounted to more than 20,000,000% including debts incurred and fums for the current year, that were raifed without a loan. These were borrowed on new taxes, and the debts were not difcharged till after the peace. The premium also for procuring this money amounted to more (69) more than thirty per cent, the funds were funk tofixty-five ; and a bank support jorninently hung over fixty-five ; and a bankruptcy imminently hung over the ftate, which, in all probability, would have fallen on it, had the war, with all poffible fuccefs, continued two years longer, by which many thoufands of the fubjects had inevitably been reduced to the utmost distress. This peace was approved by parliament; and by that treaty the nation acquired leveral illands of great value in the West-Indies, the extensive province of Canada, and a number of loyal fubjects to oppose the rebellious intentions of the democratic fectaries in America, whole infolence has excited them not only to determine what merchandife fhall be imported into that part of his majefty's dominions; but to throw into the rivers whatever they difapprove, when it arrives: and to treat with barbarous outrage their fellowfubjects who shall discharge their duty, by carrying them to that country, from this kingdom.

2. King William entered into a treaty of alliance with the Emperor, English, Spanish, Italian and Dutch, wherein they proteft, before God, that they will not make peace with Lewis the fourteenth until he had made reparation to the Holy See, and until he had annulled all his infamous proceedings against holy father Innocent the eleventh, and reftored to the protestants of France all their possessions, and an entire liberty of conscience. And the protestants were therein invited to rebel, and threatened with destruction if they did not join them in arms against their lawful fovereign. Notwithstanding this folemn affeveration king William deferted the Emperor, and concluded a feparate peace. The pope was fatisfied, and the French protestants, whom he had excited to rebellion, were fcandaloufly left to the refentment of Lewis the fourteenth; and their confciences at full liberty to continue their rebellions, without a fyllable being flipulated in their favour in that treaty, which king William had folemnly protefted before God, not to conclude before their liberties and poffeffions were reftored, and their religion tolerated in France. The fame king concluded the partition treaty, with Lewis the fourteenth, by the negotiation of Bentinck, an alien, without laying it before either the parliament, or even the privy-council. For the execution of this, the lord chancellor Somers, of old whiggifh principles, in obedience to a letter from king William, fent full powers and blank papers into Holland, to which he had affixed the great feal of England, without communicating it to the other lords of the regency, or the privy-council, in order that the king might infert what terms, and appoint what commiffioners he pleafed. By this treaty, during the life of the Spanish sovereign, he presumed to diftribute his dominions, and thereby infidioufly conveyed, together with his territories, the fubjects of that monarch to other princes, after his decease ; as a Jamaica planter does his lands and his negroes to the perfon to whom he transfers his effects. And this unheard-of violation on fovereigns and fubjects, and even on the rights of human nature, was transacted without the knowledge of that prince, and that people who were thus difpofed of. This treaty produced a new war, which cost this state, and encreased the national debt fo many millions du-· ring the reign of queen Anne.

K 2

3. The ministry feized John Wilkes and his papers, by a general warrant; fent him prifoner to the tower, from whence he was difcharged after a confinement of three days; and for which, by a verdict, he received four thousand pounds from lord Hallifax, then fecretary of flate.

3. King

(71)

3. King William, when prince of Orange, arrefted the earl of Feversham, for no other offence than that of bringing him a letter from king James, who was then in England : and afterwards upon fuspicion only from intercepted letters, took into cuftody the earl of Arran, Sir Robert Hamilton, and fent them prifoners to the tower, which Tindal allows to be illegal, the rights of the fubjects being thereby infringed, and the habeas corpus act violated. And to obviate all profecutions, for fo heinous an outrage on English liberry, an act of indemnity, for those who advised it, was passed in the subsequent feffions of parliament. During his reign, and all others, even to the time in which Mr. Wilkes was apprehended, general warrants, and feizing papers, were conftantly in practice; except in the latter part of queen Ann's reign, when the Tories, calumniated as enemies to liberty, were in adminiftration; after which, the practice was revived and continued. It was by a general warrant I and my papers were feized, when lord Chatham was prime minister. And when I objected to the illegality of the proceding, another warrant was delivered me three days after I had been in custody; but being deferted by those who ought to have affisted me, I was rendered incapable of feeking redrefs by law.

4. Another imputation of criminality was, that of the house of commons, expelling John Wilkes, efq; after he had been duly elected by the freeholders of Middlefex. John Wilkes, efq; at the time of his election, was an outlaw, and twenty thousand pounds les worth than a shilling. He was thereby disqualified to enjoy every right of a British subject, and of possibility any property in the kingdom, had there been any which remained for him to possible. On that account ere may he could not be elected but with a violation c the conftitution and the laws. Under thefe circumstances, it was a culpable lenity not to have fined the fheriff who returned him: and Proctor and Cook were in fact the legal members. On his re-election, when the outlawry was reverfed, he was again expelled and disqualified from fitting in that parliament. This was done for writing a libel on lord Weymouth. Precedents in point are to be feen in the journals of the house of commons. Dr. Parry and Arthur Hall were both expelled and difqualified for libels. Added to all this, Mr. Wilkes had been previously found guilty of four libels; three against God, and one against his king. Had he been permitted to have fat, as a member, in that parliament, his privilege would have fecured him from all punishment, as the offence of a libel is not one of those, which, by law, will authorife the commitment of a member of the commons to a prilon. The caule of God and the king demanded that the privilege of the house should not protect him from punishment for fuch heinous iniquities.

(72)

4. On king James's abdication, a few men, unelected by the people, and at the exclusion of all others, were called together by the prince of Orange. Thefe transferred the administration of public affairs into his hands, advifed him to call a convention, though not yet a king; and this convention deprived king James of all future right to reafcend the throne of the three kingdoms. Was this an object of lefs confideration than the affair of John Wilkes? had fuch a convention a precedented right of expelling one king for ever, and of putting another on his throne; and had the commons of England, after numberlefs precedents, no right to expel and to difqualify John Wilkes from fitting in parliament, for the duration of feven years only? whatever fubject, after the depoling of king James, to whom he had fworn allegiance, fhould prefume to attempt his reftoration, that man was a rebel, by the laws, and executed as a traitor. But the freeholders of Middlefex dared to re-elect John Wilkes, and petition the king to diffolve the parliament, for not admitting their hero to fit among them. I conclude, that the maladminiftration of king James juftly drew upon him the fate he fuffered. And I have hitherto difcovered no reaton to think, that Mr. Wilkes had any right to have been treated with fo fingular a favour, as to be received after difgualification.

(73)

5. Another caule of calumny was the king's refusing to comply with the London, the Middlefex, and a very few other petitions, to diffolve the parliament; because the freeholders of that county, and the people, were not fairly reprefented; and as Mr. Wilkes was fairly elected, and not permitted to fit in the house, it was an unlawful par-A multiplicity of other particulars, as liament. fallacioufly grounded, were included in thefe petitions; and then his majefty was requested to difmifs his minifters from his councils and prefence for ever. The first was an object that could not conftitutionally come before his majefty; becaule it is an eftablished maxim, that a king of Great Britain cannot attend to any reprefentation of what may pass in the house of commons, without it come directly from that house. To the other objects of their remonstrance, had they really existed, his prerogative could not lawfully extend. And even the very act of thus petitioning, addreffing, and remonstrating, by a lord mayor, and part of the London

London corporation, to difmils a ministry on the hardinels of their affertion only, was an infolence unexampled, and a most culpable temerity.

5. The commons refolve to address king William to iffue a proclamation for the apprehending of Ludlow, the regicide, then in England. The king delays his compliance therewith, until he knew him to be fafely arrived in Holland. They again wait on his majefty with their refolution, respecting the resumption of the forfeited lands in Ireland, with which the king, by an equivocating answer, evades his compliance; and it is obtained, at laft, by being tacked to a money bill, from which he was afraid to withhold his affent. The commons refolved to address his majefty, that no perfon, who was not a native of his dominions, except the prince of Denmark, be admitted to his councils in England or Ireland. To prevent this addrels, and to preferve his foreign favourites from being excluded, the king fuddenly prorogues the parliament.

The commons petition the king to remove the earls of Portland, Somers, Halitax, and Orford, from his councils; for having advised the partition treaty. The king evades an answer. They are impeached by the commons, for high crimes and mildemeanours. Somers, for having affixed the great feal of England to full powers for concluding a peace, without the commissioners being named, or the conditions of the peace made known to him; and to blank-papers, to be filled up by the king and Bentinck, as his majefty might pleafe. This was done without communicating the affair to the reft of the lords-juffices, or advising with the privy council. By the king's influence in the house of lords, a quarrel arose between them and the the commons about the time of bringing the impeached lords to trial. The house of lords arbitrarily appoint a day before the commons are prepared. The latter object to that proceeding, as unconftitutional; and refuse to attend on that day. Lord Somers and the others are brought to trial before the lords, in Westminster Hall, at which time, the commons not appearing to carry on the impeachment, the trial does not proceed, and the offenders are thereby acquitted. Such was the event of that enormous crime of affixing the great feal of England, previous to the contents, which were to be inferted in the papers; and thereby imparting an authority to the king, of ratifying, without the knowledge and confent of the privy council, whatever might be deftructive to the welfare of this kingdom. Such did that very partition treaty prove to be. It produced a long and expensive war to support the Dutch, which wasted rivers of blood, and millions of our treasure, leaving the nation with their debts encreafed from 17 millions, at the death of king William, to 52 millions, at the death of queen Anne.

(75)

6. Extending the prerogative makes no inconfiderable figure among the calumnies against his prefent majefty. And this was founded on the most humane and most laudable act of royalty; a proclamation, whereby his majefty prohibited the exportation of corn, at a time when the price was enormous, and the people in danger of a famine. Had it been delayed till the parliament had met, which could not have been in lefs than forty days, that time might have proved to be fufficient for the unrelenting luft of gain to have exported half the grain of the kingdom, and to have reduced the people to the utmost distress. To this exertion exertion of the prerogative royal, I am fully convinced, his majelly is juilly entitled. But had he not, it was of tuch a nature, that every man of fendbilly for the mileries of his fellow-fubjects, muft have applauded the royal beneficence.

L

6. King William exerted his prerogative, in another way. He refuted to give the royal affent to the bill for triennial parliaments, and to another, for excluding placemen and penfioners from the house of commons. And when the house addreffed him, on that fubject, he evaded the intention of that address, by an equivocal answer. When the commons were preparing to impeach Trevor and others, for receiving bribes, and being, guilty of most notorious corruptions, the kingdefeated that affair by a fudden prorogation of parliament. By his prerogative, he granted to the East India company the right of feizing the goods and fhips of all other fubjects, who might prefume to trade in any parts beyond the Cape of Good Hope. By this charter, the natives of England were refeinded from their constitutional rights, that had been granted by Magna Charta, which exprefsly mentions the privilege of trading in all parts of the globe. Befides this abolition of that privilege respecting Englishmen, the Dutch, and all other aliens whatfoever, were entitled to become members of that company. To that company king William granted not only the legiflative power of making what laws they pleafed; but the executive alfo, of appointing their own judges in-India. And thereby the two most incongruous, powers were united that can fubfift in the fame community; an union totally fubverfive of freedom, of the fecurity of life and poffeffions, and repugnant to the conflictution of England, Befides, this, this firetch, a power was given to the king, and paffed into a law by the representatives of the people, by which his majetly might eftablish whatever rules, qualifications, and appointments, in that charter, he might think reatonable. Such was the unlimited and unwarrantable authority then imparted to king William, by the delegated guardians of the rights and privileges of Englishmen; unexampled in its extent and nature, but by that law, which, in the reign of Henry the eighth, transferred an authority to the proclamations of that tyrant equal to the ftatutes of the realm.

(77)

7. When the civil magistrate was called on to preferve the peace, and to read the riot act, to a lawlefs mob, met in St. George's Fields, with an apparent intention of refcuing John Wilkes, efq; from prifon; and a finall part of the foldiery was thought necessary to prevent the ill effects of their tumultuous proceedings, the act being read, the tumult not only continued, but even the magistrate was infulted and wounded by a brick, or by fome other thing of a like dangerous nature, which was thrown at him. The neceffity of the cafe required the juffice of peace to command the foldiers to fire; and one or more perfons were thereby killed. Among thefe was one Allen, whom two or three of the foldiers followed into a cowhouse, and put to death. This was justly confidered as an exceeding of legal authority. One of the foldiers, infpected of this death, was feized, imprisoned, and tried at Guildford; where it was clearly proved, that he was not a perfon concerned in that unlawful transaction. The man, who was the actual offender, was faid to have fled from uffice, and lord Barrington, in his majefty's name, thanked the officer for doing his duty. This L 2

(₇8)

This whole transaction was unjustly imputed to the king, although it were abfolutely impoffible that his majefty could have had the leaft knowledge of The letter from the fecretary of war the matter. was purely official, and exactly fuch, as in the reign of king George the fecond, had been tranfmitted to the officer who commanded at Coventry, when great numbers were killed by the foldiery, in suppressing a riot about the turnpikes. Notwithstanding thefe circumstances proceeded regularly according to the flatutes of the realm, the death of Allen excepted; and that because he was followed from the place of the riot, this event was denominated the massacre of St. George's Fields. And every artifice was exerted to excite the people to an infurrection.

7. In the reign of king William, after the Macdonalds of Glencoe had taken the oaths, by law required; and were peaceably returned to their own country, an armed force was infidioufly fent as friends among them, and in one night thirty-eight men were flain in their beds. An accident alone prevented that flagitious act of cruelty from being extended to many thousands of this and of other clans. The king with his own hand figned the warrant, which authorized this maffacre, both above and below. And, notwithstanding every attempt that was made, he would never permit any of those to be punished, who were concerned in this murder, attended with every aggravating circumstance that can enter into fo execrable a deed, "confcious that, in their cause, his own was involved."

8. Another fource of difpleafure against his majesty was the pardoning of Macquirk and Kennedy, who had been found guilty of murder. Macquirk had been at Brentford on the day of Mr. Wilkes's fecond fecond election; and a riot arifing, one Clark had his head broken by Macquirk. Several days had passed, after this affair had happened, before Clark was taken ill. Mr. Sparling, apothecary, attended him; and, as I recollect, Mr. Bromfield the furgeon faw him alfo. Clark dying fo opportunely for their cause, the patriots thought it a favourable occasion of ascribing it to the blow he had received at Brentford; and accordingly one Foote, a patriotic furgeon, was employed to open the body, in order to difcover the caufe of his death. An inquest was taken by the coroner and his jury. Mr. Sparling deposed that Clark died of a fever. Foote, that he died of the wound received at Brentford. I shall take no notice of the manner in which the evidence was obtained, of Macquirk's being the perion who gave the blow. Macquirk was then feized and committed to gaol, took his trial, and by a strange oversight, neither Mr. Sparling nor Mr. Bromfield were called as evidence on the trial. Foote fwore that Clarke died of his wound received at Brentford; and on the verdict being given, guilty of death, the patriots that delight not in blood, fhouted aloud for joy. And proved by that inhuman exultation, that the fpirit of revenge, and not of juffice, had incited them to the trial of Macquirk. When this fingular affair was represented to his majefty, and it was known that Foote, the fole witness on his trial, had never feen Clark till he was dead; and that Mr. Sparling and Mr. Bromfield were not fubpœna'd on that trial, who had deposed at the coroner's inquest, that Clarke did not die of the wounds received at Brentford, it was clearly feen that their oaths would certainly have fet aside the evidence of Foote. That duty therefore which ought τo

(79)

(80)

to be infeparable from the breaft of every fovereign, of preventing any subject from being put to death unjustly, determined his majefty to be fatisfied of the reasons which induced this Foote to give fuch an evidence. In confequence of this humane refolve, a number of furgeons, of the greatest reputation in their profession, the most unexceptionable in their characters, and, by their fortunes, above all temptation from pecuniary influence, was appointed to hear what Mr. Foote had to offer in favour of that opinion, on which his oath was grounded. It would be an abfurdity to conceive, that he, who had fworn in the preceding manner, did not deliver every thing which might best support his evidence. Yet such was the event, that, notwithitanding all he offered, the gentlemen who examined him, and who could as perfectly judge from Foote's relation, as he had done from the diffection only, whether he or Mr. Sparling were right in their opinion respecting the death of Clarke, were unanimously of opinion that his death was not caufed by that wound. I will appeal, therefore, to the fenfe of every unprejudiced perfon, whether his majefty, after the circumstances of this affair had been thus examined into, and laid before him, could have confented to the execution of Macquirk, without being deemed as inftrumental in putting him to death unjuftly. Happy Englishmen! if you were fenfible of the fupreme felicity of being fubjects to a fovereign whom neither popular applause can allure, nor popular calumny intimidate from treading in the paths of justice and of mercy! by whom the innocent, and thole who deferve not death, are not forfaken, and fuffered to expire by the hands of the common executioner, through fear fear of party rage, as in the reign of Charles the fecond, that inexpressible difgrace to fovereignty. He, when numbers of his fubjects were doomed to die the victims of remorfeless vengeance, and of perjurers, fuborned by regicides and republicans; when the representation of their innocence, and the perjuries of their purfuers were laid before him, flunk, like a dastard, from the calls of justice, the admonitions of confcience, and the duty of a king, and faid; "I dare not pardon any one; his blood be upon your head, and not upon mine." And thus the innocent were led to ignominious flaughter, and the enemies of truth, onercy, and of the constitution, triumphed in their execrable actions, and revelled in the guiltless blood of their fellow-fubjects.

Kennedy was, indeed, a murderer, and ought to have fuffered that fentence to which he was justly doomed. But fuch is the well known fact, that a perfon of dictinction, feduced by the allurements of that murderer's fifter, whom he then kept as his harlot, forgot, at once, both his feelings for the flain, and his duty to his fovereign. And by his means, application was made to his majefty, with a mifreprefentation of the fact in favour of Kennedy. There is not a virtue of the human heart that may not, by artifice and deception, be induced to exceed the limits which are, by nature affigned to its exertion. His majefty liftened to the application, unknowing from what motive it proceeded; and perfuaded that no man of fuch eminence and rank, as he that applied, would prefume to mifreprefent and to deceive him, pardon was obtained for Kennedy. By these means, in one inftance, excels of virtue hath faved a villain from condign punishment. But can it therefore fore be confidered as a national misfortune, that mercy has been once mitplaced, and cruelty hitherto a ftranger to the bofom of that king who now reigns over us? 8. During the reign of king William, all legal profecution was either totally fuspended, or pardons granted even to fuch murderers whole crimes no artifice could conceal, nor milreprefentation dif-The Glencoe affaffins were preferved from guife. profecution. Somers, Trevor, and innumerable others, who had violated the conflictution, and plundered their country, were, by court management, prevented from receiving their due punish-And lastly, Titus Oates, that nefarious ment. perjurer, in confequence of whofe enormities. more than twenty innocent men were put to death; his fentence, the king attempted to have reverfed. But the commons refuled to gratify him in fo impious an act. That villain, was not only pardoned, but pensioned also. The reason of this flagitious favour being granted to fo execrable a wretch. may, perhaps, receive fome explanation from a paffage uniformly omitted by all the hiftorians of that prince's reign; although it be equally authentic with any other of his transactions whatfoever. ""I prefume to declare, fays the count d'Avaux, that I have omitted nothing which may difcover the combinations that the prince of Orange has engaged in with the most abandoned of the English. On the 21st of September, 1679, I sent intelligence that Oates, who has fince that time been fo notorious; Freeman, of whom I have already fpoken; and Du Moulin, a man of intrigue, and an execrable villain, arrived together in Holland fome years pait,

2

* D'Avaux, Tom. 1. p. 32.

(83)

past, and that the prince of Orange had been in great conferences with them."

From this paffage, may it not be reafonably fuggefted, from whence the contrivance of that plot, which never had a real exiftence, originated; by which fo many innocent men were inhumanly executed. Was it in the bofom of the prince of Orange, or did he only acquiefce in, and fupport that infernal perpetration? may not this pardon and penfion of fo execrable a villain, as Titus Oates, have emanated from the fame humane fenfation with the figning of the difpatch, that authorized the Glencoe maffacre, and refcinded all means of bringing the murderers to juffice? and was not the caufe of Oates, in this inftance alfo, that in which the king was equally involved ?

Mercy, it must be owned, was not among the vices of king William: for in the act of indemnity, passed in the year 1690, more perfons were excepted, than at the reftoration, after the kingdom had been so long deluged in civil blood, the conftitution, civil and ecclesiastic, subverted, and the king murdered at Whitehall. And it is a well known fact, that several perfons, apprehended and confined in Newgate, without their being brought to trial, through want of evidence, remained in that jail; and, after an imprisonment of many years, therein expired.

9. There is yet another imputation of criminality against his majesty; because he pardoned Jones, who had been found guilty of the most unnatural, detestable, and unpardonable of all crimes. But such being the nefariousness of the deed, ought not the commission of it to be proved in the most unexceptionable manner? because the mercy of the sovereign cannot otherwise be decently extended to fuch abominable criminals. That the witnefs and the circumftances of his evidence, againft Jones, render the crime juftly to be fufpected; or, at leaft, that it was not proved, by depofition, adequate to the infliction of death, appears to be too evident to be contradicted. And all lawyers whom I have heard to fpeak on that fubject, are unanimoufly of opinion that, on the fole evidence of the boy fo circumftanced, Jones ought not to have fuffered death. The clamour excited on this occafion, fprang entirely from the malignant intentions of those patriotic fpirits who omit not any opportunity of flandering the beft of fovereigns.

Μ

cently

o. Whether king William would have pardoned Jones, had he been on the throne, I shall leave to the judgement of my readers; after having recited what his hiftorians have delivered. Tindal fays, he was not addicted to women. Bishop Burnet pronounces, "that he had no vice but of one fort, in which he was very cautious and fecret." What this vice was, fays Tindal, he has left the world to guefs; by which means, the worft of vice has been, by his enemies, fixed upon him. *Count D'Avaux fays, "there was fo much affectation in the civilities that the prince of Orange expressed for the duke of Monmouth, that he feemed to feek, with pleature, every occasion of infulting the king of England. He indulged him with the fame liberty which was fnewen to Bentinck only, that of entering whenever he pleafed into the prince's chamber. He fearcely beftowed a favour, but at his recommendation. And no one imagined he had properly paid his court to the prince, if he left it unperformed to the duke of Monmouth.

• :

• Tom. 3. p. 121.

85 ()

Monmouth. All perfons, of the beft quality in Holland, contended with each other who should entertain him. It feemed as if the prince of Orange had changed his humour, or that he entertained fome defigns which were not well comprehended. For he who was the most jealous of all human beings, even to a degree of not permitting his princefs to receive any particular vifit, not only from man, but even from woman also, preffed the duke of Monmouth to fee the princefs every afternoon, to teach her country-dancing. He obliged the princels to learn to fcate on the ice, because the duke of Monmouth had an inclination to learn that exercife. It was one of the most extraordinary fights imaginable to fee the princefs of Orange on fcates upon the ice, with her petticoats tucked up learning to fcate, fometimes on one foot, and then on the other." I need not remark that the duke of Monmouth was reckoned to be the handfomeft of all Englishmen.

Burnet fays, "about this time, 1699, the king fet up a new favourite, Keppel, a gentleman of Gueldres. He was raifed from being a page into the higheft degree of favour, that any perion had ever attained to, about the king. He was now made earl of Albemarle, and foon after, knight of the garter; and by a quick and unaccountable progrefs, he feemed to have engroffed the royal favour to entirely, that he difposed of every thing that was in the king's power. He was a chearful young man, that had the art to pleafe; but he could fcarce fubmit to the attendance and drudgery that was necessary to maintain his post. He never had yet diftinguished himself in any thing, though the king did it in every thing. He was not cold nor dry, as the earl of Portland was thought to be." M 2

Are

Are not the former precifely the marks of favour with which Charles the fecond diffinguished all his female favourites; and the latter, those of diflike for which he put off one and took another?

" The earl of Portland, continues the bishop, observed the progress of this favour, and with great uneafinels. They grew to be not only incompatible, as all rivals for favour must be, but to hate and oppose one another in every thing; by which the king's affairs fuffered much. Portland withdrew from the court, and laid down all his employments." Madam la Valliere, the favourite miftrefs of Lewis the fourteenth, on being fupplanted by a rival, left the court, and retired into the convent of the Carmelites. I shall leave my readers to determine whether Jones, under a like fentence in the reign of the glorious king William, had been pardoned or not. It is my opinion, he would not only have received that favour, but a confiderable penfion. Becaufe Titus Oates, a penfioner of king William, had been expelled from on board a fhip of war for fodomy.

10. Among the various charges which calumny hath laid against his majesty, that of robbing the duke of Portland, by a grant of Inglewood forreft and the manor of Carlifle to Sir James Lowther, made a most amazing outcry. Since that time it has been proved, in a court of law, that not only the part of that forrest which was thus granted, had never been granted to the Portland family; but that it was illegally affumed. That the manor of Carlifle had never been a grant from the crown, is evident, because it was a purchase for life of the last furviving Lessee, to whom it had been granted by Catharine, queen dowager of Charles the second. And consequently, after the death of that Leffce, the Portlands had held it illegally legally from the crown. Hence it appears, that, initead of his majefty's robbing the duke of Portland, his anceftors had robbed the crown; and he unlawfully retained what they usurped.

87 ſ)

10. It is an uniform opinion that whenever the crown of England devolves on the lawful fucceffor, that the kingdom of Ireland conftitutionally becomes a part of his dominions. But as king William was elevated to the throne by a convention of men called together by a prince of Orange, before he was made king of England, fome doubts have arilen, whether, in fuch cafe, the Irifh were obliged to receive him as their fovereign alfo. They had fworn allegiance to James the fecond. He had never been confidered by them as attempting to subvert their religion, or to enflave them. And he could not be faid to have abdicated that kingdom; because he was arrived among them to preferve it to himfelf. Under these circumstances, does it clearly appear, by what means the frifth could have been denominated rebels, for taking arms in defence of king James? and if not rebels, how their eftates could have been forfeited, by their adherence to their only acknowledged fovereign? Whether they were rebels, or not, I shall not prefume to determine: nor confequently if their eftates were legal forfeitures. But there is one forfeiture, which feems to be of a most fingular kind. It is, that king James should be considered as a rebel for defending his kingdom against king William, and thereby forfeit that eftate, in Ireland, which he held as private property. This, however, amounting to more than twenty five thoufand pounds, of annual rent, was taken from him, and given to Elizabeth Villiers, king William's countenancing female favourite. But I am not lawyer enough to determine whether this be or be not a robbery. I leave that to the learned Mr. Lee.

yer

(88)

11. The inattention of the ministry to the Corficans, when the French had landed on their island, with intent to take possession of it, was another The brave, the mefubject of patriotic clamour. ritorious and freeborn Corficans were afferted to be most shamefully deferted; and even, that the cause of liberty herfelf was facrificed to the king of These patriotic zealots for liberty were France. therefore implacable, because his majefty would not become the Don Quixote of all fovereigns; and walte the blood of thoulands of his fubjects, and millions of their money, in defence of men whole freedom could not have been lecured, but by an eternal war; even supposing we could have affifted them to effectually as to repel the French forces from the island. If we had fought it for ourfelves, and taken possession of it, I am in doubt whether the Corficans would have thought their liberties improved by a change of mafters, and have defifted from taking arms against the troops of England. Of this I am convinced, that to have preferved that island, would have cost, in one year, as many British lives, as there are Corficans who are able to bear arms within it; and five times as much money as the fee fimple of it is worth: to fay nothing of the too extensive ftate of our foreign dominions, nor that the French had purchased it from the Genoese, to whom the Corficans were fubjects. What reafonable pretence could his majefty have formed for engaging in the affairs of Corfica? if that island be of that immenfe import, which the patriots affect to defcribe it, on what account have the king of Sardinia, the duke of Tuicany, and other Italian potentates potentates confidered it as an object altogether unworthy their concern, although it lie fo near to their dominions? what then is Corfica to us, or what are we to Corfica?

(89)

11. King William folemnly protefted before God never to make peace until the French Hugonots were reftored to their poffeffions; to the peaceable enjoyment of their religion, and till liberty was reftored to France, by re-eftablishing the states of that kingdom. He nevertheless concluded a peace with that monarch, without the least mention of either of these particulars. And left his brother Calvinists in the hands of a tyrant.

12. When the Spaniards had compelled the Englifh to leave Falkland's ifland, what an exquisite fense for the honour of old England did the patriots exprefs: nothing but war would fatisfy their indignation, and vengeance was to be poured on the Spaniards for this egregious infult on the Englift nation. His majefty and his ministry were treated with the highest indignity, for such shameful pufillanimity, as that of not declaring hostilities on the moment. Nevertheless, the king and ministers by their firmness and wildom were not of the same opinion, which these clamourous subjects appeared to be. They conceived that neither the blood nor treafure of his fubjects was to be wantonly wafted, at the incitement of fuch turbulent exclaimers. In consequence of this paternal care in the king, he by treaty obtained the recall of the Spaniards, and the ifland was refumed by his fubjects. No blood was spilt. And fmall was the expense, in preparing for a vindication of the nation's rights and honour, should the Spaniard refuse compliance with what was required. Spain acceded to our terms, peace was confirmed, and patriotifm was grievoully dilappointed, pointed, by that humane negociation which spared our lives and treafure, and refeinded them from the hopes of carrying their fanguinary principles into execution, whilft the kingdom was engaged in a foreign war.

12. In the reign of king William, the people of Scotland planted a colony on the lithmus of Darien. By which the fmuggling trade on that coaft, fo advantageous to the Dutch, was in danger of being demolifhed. The king's ministers, in Scotland, encouraged the Scots in this undertaking, thinking it would prove abortive; or, by the immenle expence, cure them of the inclination of engaging in fimilar undertakings for the future. During this conduct, in Scotland, his majefty, in the greatest privacy, fent officers to Jamaica, the Leward islands, and the continent of America, and proclamations were iffued, in his name, flrictly commanding his fubjects, on no pretence whatever, to hold correspondence with, or to afford any affiftance, by arms, ammunition, provisions or neceffaries whatfoever, to the Scots at Darien. In this manner, whilst the Scottish subjects were encouraged at home to compleat their fettlements at Darien, they were treated as outlaws abroad, and deprived of every thing necessary for their support. In this state, being attacked by the Spaniards, they were driven from the fettlement; and in fpite of every application that could be made by all Scotland, no attention was paid to it, no demand was made on the Spaniards to compensate for this violence. But British honour and British interest filently gave way to the more powerful motives of Dutch affection, which reigned predominant in that king's heart; who, from being a petty prince, and fervant of the united provinces, vinces, was exalted to the thrones of three powerful kingdoms.

(91)

13. When his prefent majefty afcended the throne, he chose to have his civil list fixed at eight hundred thousand pounds a year; the same it had been in the reign of king George the fecond; with this difference only, that the furplus, which had ariten from the revenues appropriated to the payment of it, and had been applied by the preceding ministers to the king's private use, was now to contribute to the national expence, in-augmentation of the finking fund. This furplus was then known to have been very confiderable. And fince that time, the duties appropriated to the discharge of the civil lift, have amounted, on an average of the fourteen years of the prefent reign, to more than a million annually. In confequence of the preceding eftablishment of eight hundred thoufand pounds, the public has received an annual advantage of two hundred thousand; being in the whole furn two millions eight hundred thoufand pounds. But as from this diminution of the ufual revenue which arofe from the whole duties appropriated thereto, in the reign of king George the fecond, his majefty's civil lift inevitably incurred a debt of fix hundred thousand pounds. The ministry, confeious of the advantage which the kingdom had received from the afcertaining of the yearly revenue at the fum above-mentioned, applied to parliament for a grant to difcharge the preceding debt; and as it was requefted with reason, it was granted with justice. This application was not unprecedented in former reigns, in which no advantage had been derived to the nation, from the furplus of the revenue that exceeded the fum eftablished for the civil list ex-pences.

N

It is manifeft, however, by adding the fix pences. hundred thousand pounds raised to the eight hundred thouland yearly income, and then deduct. ing the whole fum from what the king would have received, had the civil lift been left as it flood in the reign of his grandfather, that the nation has been benefited in the addition of two million two hundred thousand pounds. Hence it appears, inftead of more money being taken from the annual income, to supply the civil list expences of his prefent majefty, than of king George the fecond, it may be truly faid, that by the limitation of that revenue to 800,000% a year, the king has prefented, and the nation received the benefit of 2,200,000/. more than it would have done, had the payment remained as indefinite as it did in the preceding reign. And this advantage still continues proportionally to accrue.

But the prefent patriots, being the spawn of those who were uniformly rebels to the best of kings, and instruments of oppression in the hands of the worst, are filent, respecting the advantages which the nation has acquired; and clamour incession oppression the grant above-mentioned, as the most oppressive that had ever been devised, and the most injusious to the people.

13. During the reign of king William, the civil lift was fixed at feven hundred thousand pounds a year; when that sum would purchase double what it will at prefent. This was obtained under the pretence of a pension, of one hundred thousand pounds to the queen Dowager; and for supporting the houshold of the duke of Gloucester. To the queen's use he never paid a penny. To the duke of Gloucester's, fifteen thousand pounds only. And he refused to advance one quarter's revenue to purchase plate and furniture for his royal highnels's use. He spent it chiefly on Dutchmen and Renegadoes of their native country, on one female favourite, and in the exercise of that fort of vice in which he was fo fecret; and chiefly in Holland.

1

) 93

(

14. A standing army is another subject of loud complaint against his present majesty. At the fame time, it feems altogether irreconcileable with the state of things, to reduce the number of landforces, when it is confidered, how greatly the dominions of the crown exceed those which it poffeffed at the revolution : And that the fpirit of rebellion was foon manifested after his majefty's afcent to the throne, not only in this kingdom, but on the continent of America. Must it not therefore appear to be an act of infanity to enter on a reduction of the army? For fuch is the prefent ipirit of the patriots and their populace, it cannot reasonably be called in question, but that the city mob and city apprentices would long fince have repeated the like outrages which were perpetrated in the reign of king Charles the first; have driven his prefent majefty from his palace, or have committed fome act of rebellion, even yet more violent against him had no standing troops existed. Would they not have compelled the parliament to perpetrate whatever they demanded, and once more in civil bloodfhed have brought their fovereign to the block and subverted the constitution in church and state? even as it is, they, on one occasion, attempted violence on lord North. That this is not a chimerical fuggestion is more than probable, from the words of Dr. Prieftly, their spiritual champion. That tender-conficienced and loyal teacher, in his effay on the principles of government p. 38. when N 2 fpeaking freaking of the murder of Charles the first decloses, that "fuch a transaction would have been," which both grammar and fenfe require to be written will be, " an immortal honour to this country, whenever the fuperflitious notion (the facreducis of kings) fhall be obliterated." And if it be not now effectually obliterated, it is not to the fupineness or malignancy of him and his brethren, the patriots, that its continuance can be afcribed. Even Dr. Price, in his appeal to the public, p. 39, in enumerating the caules of our prefent evils, introduces that of "giving fecurity to the Hanoves fucceffion. This, fays he, is in truth the fundamental grievance of the kingdom; and that patrictifm, the first object of which is not the removal of it, can be nothing but an impofture". To expect that fuch principles will not produce the fame effects, which they have hitherto done, is to suppose the order of nature to be abfolutely changed. And will it be more abfurd to suppose, that the feed of an onion will produce a pine-apple, than that fuch principles, unchecked, will not generate rebellion. Such are the words of these reverend seekers of the Lord. And will it not embarrafs the unmerciful Tommy Townfhend, and the modeft Mr. Lee to difcover any thing in the writings of Dr. Johnson, or myself, to nearly approaching to treafon? and yet, to ufe the words of that fellow Lee, "we fee no notice taken, no complaint made of Books," wherein the principles of regicides and rebels are impioufly profeffed and publicly promulgated. А fanding army is therefore become indipenfibly requisite. It was to men of their principles and to ferve their own purpofes that a ftanding army was first begun, and causelessly established in this' kingdom; kingdom; and, in confequence of their prefent exertion of the fame principles, it is at length become a neceffary meafure that it be continued, in order to prevent their republican purpofes; and for the fecurity of his majefty and the conflictution. Thus the very forces, which they eftablished, by an unforefeen event are become the evident means of fuppreffing their feditious principles from being carried into execution.

(

(95)

14. When king William afcended the throne, a ftanding army was unknown in thefe realms. It was he began and continued it, during life. It was he, and the Whigs, who, in opposition to the Tories, prevented their being diminished below feven thousand forces. And in one year he kept three thousand men in pay more than the number voted by parliament. It was the Tories who infifted on the Dutch guards being fent home; and on the renegado Frenchmen being difbanded. All mankind are acquainted with what reluctance the king submitted to this necessary act. And when the parliament would not confent that he fhould keep his alien guards, which were an eternal reproach to the honour and fidelity of the English, he faid, " if I had a fon, by God thefe Dutch guards fhould not quit me."

15. Parliamentary corruption, placemen, and penfioners, conflitute another charge against the prefent reign. That corruption is undoubtedly great enough. But from the revolution, to his majesty's accession to the throne, the Whigs had so far effaced all fense of national virtue, that the case was, in fact, no longer a corruption spread by the ministry, among the members of parliament; but a demand of the members to be corrupted by the ministry, which would take no denial. For a majority

ń

(74)

jority of those delegated defenders of the peoples rights, confidered the revenues of places and penfious as a kind of heredrary right established by presidential; and therefore that no minister should be pointed to transact the national bufinels, however advantageous it might prove, without their being previoully obtained by pecuniary emoluments. And fince we have experimentally found that the exclusion of some placemen has not improved the integrity of the houfes, what reafon have we to believe that, if not a man of that fort had a feat in either houle, that the parliament would be less corrupt, or lefs compliable with the propolitions of the minifiers? The commissioners of the customs, excife, itamps, army agents, and a great number of others, are precluded from feats in the houle of commons, as men too much under ministerial influence. But is the number in favour of court measures thereby diminished? would it not be better, according to the prefent and degenerate difpolitions of mankind, to have fuffered thefe men to have remained members; becaule their falaries would then have influenced to nothing more than what is now accomplifhed by others, at a much greater expence ? For now two fets of men are paid for that which might be as well performed by one alone; and the expences faved to the people which are now waited on the latter. When corruption cannot be cured, which, by the practice of the Whigs, has been fostered and continued through almost a whole century; when religion and national integrity, by their encouragment, allo have been laughed into fcorn; when all men are convinced that the prefent complainants in parliament have practifed the fame corrupt means, when they were in power; and that those who are not,

not in that house, are in opposition to the fame meafures only, because they do not participate in this diftribution of corruption; were it not better to admit all placemen and pensioners to fit in the house of commons, and thereby at least to fave the public money; fince by the uniform experience of eightyfix years, every reasonable expectation of restoring public virtue is at an end?

To what purpole then can annual or triennial parliaments be revived, unless the dispositions of men can be changed by their own votes in the houfe of commons? by fhortening the duration, the price of corruption will increase, fince men will be bought whatever it may be. And if they have but one year's market, they know that the business of the ftate cannot proceed without them; and therefore they will fell their commodity at a higher price. The nation must confequently be taxed for more money; the people be oppreffed to provide it; and corruption become more egregious than before, the fole event which is to be expected from annual parliaments. That we have no longer trienial parliaments is owing to the Whigs, those friends of England, who without applying to their conftituents for a re-election, most impudently continued the preceding election from three to feven years. Ιt appears from the hiftory of this kingdom that, in the reign of Edward the fecond, there were almost as many parliaments as years. In that of Richard the fecond, there were two new parliaments more than the years he reigned; and three in one year. And yet, are thefe times fuch as any friend to human kind, or lover of his country, can wifh to fee reftored? can it be deemed an unwarrantable conclusion, that the preference of principles to fimilar to those of the long parliament, liament, in the reign of Charles the first, who alfo roared for triennial parliaments, will, like them alfo, when become a majority, rob the king of his prerogative, and establish a parliament that can be prorogued and diffolved by themfelves alone? are not the rebellious acts of that parliament fuch as they yearn to imitate? and would they not, at once, by a like law, not only deprive the king of his prerogative, in the antecedent respects; but rob the people of their right of a general election, by perpetuating themfelves for ever? fuch were the transactions in those days, when they had the effrontery to pretend, that they took arms in defence of the people's rights and privileges, and for the king himfelf, against whom they waged war and fought to flay: fuch will they not proclaim themfelves to be, whenever they can find their power is become predominant in the commons.

15. The prince of Orange, in his declaration, afferts, "that his expedition was intended for no other defign but to have a free and lawful parliament." The first instance of his fincerity was, to call together those who had been members of any parliaments in the reign of Charles the fecond. This proceeding was, in fact, a politive interdiction, not only of all those who had been members in the reign of James the fecond, but of every other subject, except the mayor, aldermen, and the deputies of the common council of London. Of the members, as it was forefeen, those, who had been for excluding king James from the throne, made the largest humber. And we are told by Tindal, " the prince thought, that befides the fuffrages of the peers, it was proper to be authorized by others, s which might pals for those of the people." And those men, to selected and convened, addressed , the the prince to take upon him the administration of public affairs. And thus this affembly, in the place of a parliament, was elected by the prince of Orange alone, on a subject the most important to a state. One hundred and fixty men, with the mayor, aldermen, and deputies of London, were confidered as a majority of the people of England; and the administration of the nation was imparted to him without the least application for the confent of the reft of the nation. A convention was called by the prince of Orange, the members of it were elected, and they placed the crown on the heads of him and the princefs Mary, and excluded king James, without confulting the people on that most momentous transaction. It was now that parliamentary corruption, but little practifed in the antecedent reigns, was foread with amazing zeal and rapidity; and inftead of calling free parliaments, none had hitherto been fummoned, in which a tenth part of pecuniary influence had been exerted to supplant the freedom of elections. Burnet fays he complained of this corruption to the king. His majefty anfwered, that it was impossible to be prevented. Such being the cafe, at that time, I imagine that eighty-fix years of successive corruption hath not changed that impossibility into a thing prasticable, at prefent. For, by men of like principles with the prefent patriots, from 1688, to the acceffion of his prefent majefty, that luxuriant plant hath been to carefully manured and watered; hath taken fuch deep root; and brought forth fruit in fuch abundance, it appears to be as eafy to abolish the existence of parliaments, as to eradicate the corruption of them. And from an unremitting experience, is there not the greatest reason to believe, with the revival of annual parliaments, and with the ()

the virtues of John Wilkes, efq; added to thole of the prefent patriots, in and out of the commons, that the torrent of corruption will ftill perfevere in its wonted rapidity?

16. The fale of places, and frauds committed by those in office, constitute an acculation of the prefent ministers. I can recollect but one instance in which the former hath been brought to proof. And on that occasion the charge was refuted by a , verdict of twelve jurors, in a court of law. Of the other charge the fole evidence hitherto appears to consist in nothing but the clamours of the patriots and the populace.

16. In the reign of king William, Burnet tells us, that places were fet to fale by the Whigs; the fleet was victualled with unwholfome food; the army in Ireland left unturnished with every thing neceffary; artillery, horfes, carriages, bread, medicines, &c. The duke of Leeds, Trevor, speaker of the commons, Guy, Craggs, and a number of others equally culpable, were impeached for bribery. The parliament was then prorogued, in order to preferve thefe fcandalous offenders from punifhment. And an act of indemnity was foon paffed to referred the means of bringing them to juflice. Befides which, most egregious abuses, ill practices, and intolerable exactions, by colonels and agents, were perpetrated on the officers and common men. And among the numerous frauds, that of falle endorfements on exchequer bills was one, by which vaft fums were amaffed by men in office. The perpetrators of all these heinous crimes, were altogether unnoticed, or but flightly punifhed.

17. Another cause of murmuring is the behaviour of the soldiery in their quarters, which exists in in clamour only, as far as it has hitherto been proved.

(101)

17. In the reign of king William, the officers and foldiers extorted fubfiftence money from those on whom they were quartered, and to this violence they were chiefly induced by the frauds, and withholding of their fubfiftence money, by their colonels and agents.

18. The diminution of the gold coin of the kingdom was of late become 10 notorious, that it was abfolutely neceffary to put a ftop to that iniquity. This was done by afcertaining the weights at which each piece fhould pais, according to the reign in which it was ftruck. This most reasonable proceeding was, neverthelefs, a caufe of prodigious outcry; although a reform were abfolutely indifpenfible. The event has proved the excellence of the measure; the evil is remedied, and the nation has been put to the expence of 25,000*l*. only for a new coinage.

18. A like diminution of the coin was fuffered to take place, fo long in the reign of king William, that 1,200,000l. (Burnet fays it cost 2,200,000l.) were raifed in parliament, by a tax on windows, for fupplying the deficiency of clipt money. Five per cent was given as a reward for bringing in unclipt money; and three-pence an ounce for all wrought plate above its real value, and the use of plate was prohibited in public houses. Notwithstanding all this mode of proceeding, which would at this day be pronounced an act of arbitrary power, the diffress occasioned by this recalling of the coin was fo great, that there was not money lufficient for the payment of lervants, labourers, and others, who were in weekly want of their wages. Government tallies and debentures were at forty, fifty, and fixty, exchequer, and even bank bills at twenty per cent. difcount, Such is the infinite difparity between the measures taken by the ministry, in the reign of the glorious king William, and by those in this of his prefent majesty.

tures

19. Are not the marriages of their royal highneffes the dukes of Gloucester and Cumberland, unprecedented inftances of two brothers engaging in matrimonial contracts, without previoufly declaring their intentions to him who was their brother and their fovereign? Precedents in this kingdom, without respect to their good or evil tendencies, are too frequently confidered as authorities adequate to a justification for fimilar behaviour on fubsequent occasions, as if the sole circumstance of preceding could impart a fanction to all that might follow of a like nature. I believe if Cain had flain his brother Abel, in England, the prefent patriots would have brought that fratricide as an argument against the justice of his present majefty, had he permitted one brother to be put to death for the murder of the other, provided it could promote their conficientious purposes. His majefty, on the antecedent events, having confidered the numeroufnefs of his children, and the ill effects which might arife from intermarriages between the royal family and those of his subjects, entered on a refolution of preventing fuch ill effects by anticipation; and before it could have the leaft appearance of answering any intention against any prince descended from his grandfather.

It was therefore enacted, that no perfon lineally descended from that king, should legally contract a marriage, without the previous consent of his majesty, his heirs, or successors. But if any such de(103) descendant, above the age of twenty-five years, shall persist in such intention of matrimony, upon giving notice to the privy council of fuch intention, after the expiration of one year, he or the fhall be permitted to marry; notwithstanding the king may not have confented to it; unless the parliament, during that time, fhall expressly declare their difapprobation of fuch intended marriage. It is not eafy to fuggeft a method that at once fo justly unites the claims of national felicity with those of nature. Such princes are prohibited from marrying, without the king's confent, only until they become well informed of the confequences which may probably enfue fuch contracts. They are then free from their fovereign's controul, and left to the two houses of parliament, without his affent required to their determinations. If the marriage appear to be reasonable, it will certainly be approved; if not, it refts on the houfes to juftify their refufal. And yet, fo propitioufly promifing to preclude innumerable ill effects, as this act indifputably is, it was not the lefs an object of patriotic calumny.

19. Such an act, as the preceding, could find no place in the regn of king William. Queen Mary had no children, nor did I ever hear that Elizabeth Villiers, or any favourite, male or female, was ever suspected of being, in a breeding state, from any intercourfe with that prince, bifhop Burnet excepted. And even that fulpicion of the prelate was entertained by himfelf alone. The bishop, in whom credulity and truth were as diftant from each other as the two poles, paid an implicit obedience to the diclates of the former, and totally difregarded those of the latter. To his honour, however, it must be allowed, that he never diminished his native flock of verity, thro' the the practice of his life. For, in all his relations, he constantly made use of that only which is either more or lefs than the truth; and hence, having never touched the truth itfelf, he went out of the world poffeffed of the whole original flock with which he came into it. As to his credulity, although it were daily wafted to the bones, yet, like the liver of Prometheus, what was devoured in the day, was regenerated in the night; and it never fuffered a real leffening to the hour of his expiration. In confequence of this profligate credulity, this right reverend æconomift of veracity being occafionally indifpofed, by an advertisement was informed where a certain quack doctor might be found, who by cafting his lordfhip's water, could not only discover his disease, but fend him a cure, without the intervention of a perfonal enquiry into his complaints. Credulity feized on the occasion, and a fervant was dispatched to this quack, with a phial of his holy water. But fuch were the effects of fate, that neither the fanctity of the bifhop's manners, nor the prefervation of his precious health, could prevent the phial from being broken in the carrying. The fervant, who poffeffed, at leaft, as much fenfe as his mafter, thought that the water of one perfon might prove as good for the prefent purpofe, as that of another, and being apprehenfive of being chidden also, if the accident were difcovered, bought a phial, and knowing that water, fresh made, would create some suspicion in the doctor, entered a beer house, and defired that the phial might be filled with fome water that had been made during the night. The good woman of the house, who was, it feems; breeding, filled it with her own, and away trudged the fervant to the phyfical infpector of urine.

On

On his return, the bishop cried out, "Weel Mon, what kens the doctor of my urine?" My lord, fays Sandy, "after meckle leuking on the water, he e'en told me, the perfon who made that water is with bairn." "Ah! geud God, cried his lordship, I always told his majesty what it would at length come to. +I my felf faw a great deal of this management, for I was then at court."

20. The displeasure against the princes for their marriages, was another article of refentment against his majefty, by the patriots, who prefume to cenfure his private as much as his public conduct. But certainly no fovereign hath ever fhewn fo little diflike on to unexampled an occasion. It is true, they do not appear at court, and there it ends. In all other respects, no mark of refentment is shewn either by his majesty or the queen.

20. King William and queen Mary refented the application of the princess Anne to parliament, for fixing her revenue, when the fo juttly declined the dependence on the generofity of a Dutchman for the payment of her income. This behaviour was to offensive to king William and queen Mary, who fuspected that this application had proceeded from the advice of the dutchels of Marlborough, that

+ As the writer of this account had no other authority than his own affertion, to authenticate the above paffage, and as, in all probability, he was not born till thirty years after the event could have happened, it recurred to him that the truth of it might poffibly be called in question. Notwithstanding this fingle circumflance, he still expects that it will obtain the credit which it deferves. Since it is to the full as practicable for the writer to have been at the court of London, before he was born, as it was for Burnet to be at Whitehall, before he left Scotland. And yet, on fuch kind of evidence, much of his lordship's history depends.

that they ordered the princes to difinis her from her fervice: and because she would not comply with this injunction, she was forbidden the court. In this difunion the fifters remained; and the pious queen Mary set out to answer for this want of natural affection, in another world, without defiring to be reconciled to her only fister in this.

21. Another modeft charge of the patriots against his majefty is, that of violating the grants made in royal charters to the Americans, by the preceding kings of England; and in prefuming to extend into the colonies the legislative right of taxation by the parliament of Great Britain; which, as these subjects affert, is done with intent to enflave the good people of America. But will these Americans and their confederates, in this kingdom, uniformly allow, that the royal prerogative can, by grants, constitutionally annihilate the authority of the British legislature? will not this be to acknowledge and fupport, that a more exceffive power remains at prefent in the crown than was extirpated by the bill of rights? by that bill, the king is inhibited from fuspending or difpenfing with laws already made; but by the prerogative, for which the patriots and the Americans contend, the parliamentary power of making laws, in this realm, respecting America, is not only fuspended and dispensed with, but absolutely annihilated by the king. Becaufe, by his prerogative, he can referred it from parliament, and bequeath it to the colonies. Is this doctrine coincident with that which is fo vehemently urged against exerting the prerogative-royal, even to the prefervation of the people from ftarving? But, to men of their principles, every excels of that power is lawful; and the least legal exertion of it a violence, as each of them may quadrate with their deligns.

figns. They never have allowed, nor ever will allow, any neasure to be just or unjust, but as it corresponds with or opposes their purposes. Has not the legislature abolished the ancient rights of the church, of fuit and fervice in the field and at the courts of kings, and barons, of marriage, ward, foccage and villain fervice; together with a multiplicity of others, fo folemnly granted, in magna charta, by compact between the fovereign and his lubjects, confecrated by the folemn rites and fanction of religion, and confirmed more than thirty times in parliament? and, were not these amazing changes accomplished by the legislature, in proportion as the progreffive alteration in manners, the augmentation of riches, and the welfare of the tate required them? But it feems the grants of kings, to the subjects in America, are to be held more facred and inviolate than the great charter of England. And the power of the two houses, added to that of the fovereign, on the prefent state of circumflances in America, fo different from that which existed when their charters were originally granted, is to remain inert, and fupinely fee the colonies difinembered from their mother country. It thould feem a parliament can lawfully do every thing in Great Britain, and nothing in America. The king can neither revoke his grants, nor the parliament alter them, whatever may be the emergencies which demand it.

In objection to the right of taxing them by parliament, they answer, that they have an exclusive privilege by charter, to tax themfelves, by their own affemblies, by whom it can alone be equitably done. But do these grants expreisly exclude the legislative authority of this kingdom from making laws to levy money in America? and if they do, is there an an Englishman uninfatuated with the prefent patriotifm, or unactuated by finister motives, who would not exclaim against the validity of such a pretended right in the crown? would not even these patriotic malcontents be then the first to roar against kings, for infracting the rights, subverting the liberties, destroying the constitution, and enflaving the people? but now it feems right, liberty and conftitution are all to be preferved by fultaining that very prerogative-royal, which, on other occasions, they to much affect to execrate and confine. Innumerable are the charters granted by kings to corporations in this kingdom, by which they are authorifed to levy money for their own uses; but are these corporations, by thefe charters, protected from the payment of parliamentary impofts?

Have not the Americans, by their charters, the right allo of making laws for themfelves? will not the fame arguments, therefore, which are urged in favour of their difobedience to taxation, be equally coercive in every other legiflative ordinance? and from thence, will it not as logically refult, that the parliament of Great Britain has not the leaft right to enact fuch laws, as may, in the leaft degree, or in any inflance, effect the Americans in their feveral provinces? and then, will not that exemption amount to an abfolute independancy on the legiflative authority of this realm? a conclusion, which, I fhould think, can hardly be warranted by the conflictutions, either of Great Britain, or of the colonies.

Befides the preceding objection of these republican malcontents, to comply with the acts which are made, respecting taxations on them in the provinces, they alledge, in their defence also, that they

100 ſ)

they have no right of electing members; and therefore are not represented in the house of commons, none to superintend their concerns, and to affist in laying taxes by their own confent, as it is the undoubted privilege of all those subjects who refide in Great Britain : but in this they must confcioufly offer what they know to be untrue. For, in this predicament, they stand exactly on a level with nine parts in ten of the fubjects of this kingdom, who have no elective right. But the rights of election, and of being represented, are distinct things. For the inftant the members are elected by the few, they become the representatives of all. Unlefs this were the cafe, all those subjects, who have copyhold effates to any value, money in the funds, or on mortgages, to any amount whatever, who annually trade and manufacture for great fums, as well as innumerable others, who have not freeholds of forty shillings a year, or are entitled to vote by freedom, burgage tenure, or other qualification of the leveral cities and towns, which fend members to parliament, are not repre-A conclusion to which, I imagine, no fented. Briton will accede. The Americans, therefore, although they be without the right of election, are nevertheless possessed of that of being represented, as fully as that great majority of non-electors who inhabit this island. Being therefore, in a like condition, they ought, for that reason, to pay the like obedience to the acts of this legislature, with those who dwell in England, and are not entitled to the privilege of election.

Should this vaft majority of non-electing conflituents prefume to withhold the taxes, which are imposed on them, for the preceding reasons, which they may as justly urge as the Americans, would thefe ( thefe be arguments fufficient to protect them from a compulfory payment? the counties palatine of Chefter and Durham had, and now have laws peculiar to themfelves. The former fent no members to parliament, till late in the reign of Henry the eighth; the latter, in that of Charles the fecond. Were they, before they fent members, without the reach of parliamentary taxation? were not their grants as valid, and their objections as reafonably to be made, as by the Americans; but did that avail them ?

Before the American flamp act was made, what inftance is there to be found, that these reftiff fubjects conceived the idea of not being reprefented in parliament? did they ever abstain from applying thereto, on all occasions, which might ferve their purpofes and promote their interest? during the last war, when they boasted to expel the French from Canada, if arms were fent them, and when that request was complied with, it was found, by experience, that all their fanatic vauntings expired in wind; and that the Canadians, who were not a tenth part of their number, would have driven them into the Atlantic ocean. On this diffres, did they not conceive themselves to be repretented in parliament, and apply for an army to fave them from deftruction? and was not that fuccour fent and fupported, at an immenfe expence, to this kingdom? By this act alone, were they not preferved from the hands of their enemies? and now they prefume to refift the British right of taxing them, by that very legislature, from whom they fought and received their temporal falvation. Such hath been, is, and ever will be the thanklefs returns of those men, from whose hearts it would be exceffively more difficult to eradicate ingratitude, tude, than to divest atsenic of the power of poisoning.

. . . .

(111)

It fhould feem then, that these graceless fubjects confider the people of England as their flaves, to labour, and to find men and money for their fervice and defence : and that they are our mafters, at full liberty to raife or withhold either of them as they please, whatever may be the emergencies that may happen in this part of the world. Itt tact, we are to be at all the expense of treasure and of blood, and they to reap the advantage of it, without contributing one shilling, or one man, towards the demands of either of them. Would not this infolence, if indulged, be adequate to the folly of toffing up a halfpenny on the ridiculous conditions, that, by heads, the Americans win, and by tails, we in England lose. If the spirit of a Briton and a loyal fubject can bear this infult on his understanding, on his property, and on his right of preferving life in common with all other his majesty's subjects, their fouls are not made, at prefent, of the same estimable materials with those of their anceftors. I will appeal to the common fense of all those, who are acquainted with the principles of those trans-Atlantic sectaries, whether, in times of war, without the legiflative obligation of the parliament, they would raife a shilling that was not to be folely applied to their own particular advantages? are these the subjects who are to be permitted to refift the laws of Britain, and to be indulged with raifing their own taxes on all emergencies? to them is his majefty to apply, by requifition, for fupplies to be levied at their option? and is the legiflature of Great Britain to remain inexertive of her constitutional rights, and to be to flagitioufly treated by fuch rebellious ingrates? Britons, tons, Britons, if you have lost all fensation for the honour of your king and country, feel for your lives and properties at least; and suffer not yourselves to be thus audaciously infulted by those Americans. who dare to treat you as men fubservient to their purpofes, and to fix on you alone the whole expence of peace and war. Will you tamely behold those enemies to your constitution, to withhold themfelves from danger, and their money from contributing to the general caufe at their pleafure? fuch, however, is the despicable state to which the prefent patriots, those protectors of your rights and liberties, are labouring to reduce you! can fuch men be the friends of their country? but fuch hath been the audacious infolence of these American fectaries; for fuch alone are engaged in this rebellious opposition to the king that even the right of taxing the Americans, by a British parliament, is no longer the object in difpute. For fince the legislature thought proper to enact, that teas, carried to America, fhould, on landing, be fubject to a finall duty, the ftate of the cafe is changed entirely. It is no longer a conteft, whether they shall be taxed by parliament; but, whether goods, exported from-Great Britain, shall be landed in America. The payment of this tax was altogether optional in the people of that continent. For, unless it were confumed, no revenue could be derived from the impost: and every man was left at will to be a confumer or not. But fuch were the fentiments which these dilloyal subjects entertained of their own integrity, and fuch their confidence in each other, that confeious of their internal rotteness of foul, they were convinced, that fhould that commodity be permitted to be let on fhore, their interested patriotifm triotilm would not prevent its being confumed. The Boftonians, therefore, difregarding the claims of common honefty, as well as law, if any fhare of the former virtue did then remain among them, boarded the fhip by force; rifled the cargoe; threw it into the river, and thus committed felony. Such was the unpardonable contempt which they manifested to the laws of Great Britain. These are the men who still protest they are meritorious and loyal subjects; and who are encouraged and defended by the patriots in this their unexampled outrage.

(112)

The event has evinced that the magistrates of Bofton either had not the power or the inclination to put the laws in execution against those rebellious plunderers; the latter of which is well known to be the truth. That the governor was not armed with powers, nor poffeffed of fufficient authority to compel them to it, is an indubitable fact. And yet, according to patrictic and prefbyterian doctrine, this most atrocious infult on the legislative body of this kingdom is to be left entirely to the cognizance of their own magistrates, who, it is certain, will pay no more attention to it, than neceffity shall compel them to. Would not that, in fact, be adequate to a plenary indulgence in the crime? Not a felon of them has been apprehended: and if ten thousand of them had been tried for ten thousand murders, committed in that or the like transaction, they would have been acquitted to a man with exultation, and with triumph over justice. Are these men with impunity to riot in their outrages; to remain unamenable to all courts of law; and, be fecured from condign punifhment, becaufe they and their magifirates are equally excited by the fame rebellious principles? do they deferve to enjoy joy the protection of the laws against thieves, in this kingdom, who are advocates for fuch criminals in America?

Are those audacious men, who have thus forcibly committed, not only felony, but high crimes, and mildemeanours, if not trealon against the fate, to receive no chaftifement from the legiflature? is not the fanction of the laws, which was violated by force, to be reftored by force legally eftablished to that end? but lenient and temporifing measures are, alone, to be adopted and purfued, fay the modest patriots. The Romans never temporifed but once. They were fpeedily convinced of that folly, abstained from all repetition of a fimilar miftake, and, by that refolution, fubdued the world. Half measures deftroy the best designs. The minister, on occasions like the present, that deliberates is loft. Not only he, but even the dignity of the crown, and the happiness of the people fink therewith. But I truft that an ill-timed and injudicious lenity will not avert the fuccefs of fo just and fo national a cause. For there are times in which the ftrict application of a proper power can alone preferve a nation's welfare.

In no inftance of outrageous violation of the legiflative authority, hath fuch an indulgence been fhewn to criminals, fo egregioufly offending. In return for all this violence, what has hitherto proved to be the infliction on the perpetrators? the Boftonians are prohibited, by law, from exporting, and from importing, in the port of Bofton only, with penalties annexed to transgreffions of that law: which, however, does not extend to the prohibition of fuel. Another place is appointed for the meeting of their affemblies, and a port allo is appropriated to the purpoles of navigation. And

And fuch offenders, as it is well known will not be treated with the justice of that punishment which their crimes demand, may be now fent hither to be tried, in the courts of this kingdom, in which there is no shadow of pretence that the laws will be unjuftly carried into execution. Can the hiftory of all ages produce one inftance of fo lenient a proceeding against fuch egregious offenders? added to this, a general and fome troops, with a few ships of war, are ordered to prevent the like outrages for the future; and to provide that these acts of the legislature be not infulted and rendered effete, by a like rebellious action as the former were. This is the whole exertion of legiflative authority which has hitherto been enacted, relative to the Bostonian rebels, on which fuch a tumultuous outcry of infracted charters, and intended flavery is bellowed through the realm, against his majesty, his parliament, and his ministers. Did either Cromwell or the glorious king William poffels the supreme power at this time, the former, who knew the infidious dispositions of the prefbyterians; and the latter, who never failed feverely to inflict those with punishment, who opposed his will, would not permit these rebels to perfevere in fuch refiftance, and efcape on fuch eafy terms? would they not then have reason to lament the want of that mercy which they now decry as criminal, in their fovereign, on the throne.

But, in order to obviate all objection against the king, his parliament and ministers, respecting the conduct which has been adopted and purfued in the preceding inftance, I will take up the principles and opinions of those patriots, relative to the fovereigns of Great Britain and their ministers; suppose, for a while, that his majesty is nothing Q thing more than a chief magistrate and trustee for the people; and that his ministers are obliged to advise and execute that alone which is just, and most likely to be advantageous to the whole community, whether in Britain, America, or other place whatever.

Is it not an invariable maxim of found polity. that all those, who are fubjects to the fame state, should be equally obedient to the acts of her legiflature? can there be any thing more just than that all fuch should contribute their proper proportion of fupplies, both in men and money, for futtaining all national exigencies? and is it not the indifpenfable duty of fuch a king and of his minifters to apply to the fupreme legiflative power, and to obtain fuch acts as may compel those revolters from their constitutional allegiance, who would withhold themfelves from fuch duties, to become obedient to the laws, and contribute to the support and welfare of the state? are not these the measures which his majesty and his ministers have purfued? could fuch conduct have been omitted without the juft charge of inattention and neglect on a chief magiltrate, and truftee of the British people? are Great Britain and Ireland alone to raife the national fupplies, and the Americans to be left untaxed by the British parliament, would not that partiality to the latter be an oppression on the former; and his majefty, on patriotic principles, be a most delinquent magistrate, and faithleis truftee? hence then, whether the king be confidered as he constitutionally is, or according to the fentiments of patriots and lectaries, what reaionable objection can be framed against his prefent measures in Botton? shall the Americans contribute their treafure, or not; determine what shall be imported 117) ported from this kingdom to his majefty's colonies; and exported from thence, as they please, and be indulged in this flagitious breach of allegiance? and lastly, will you Britons, and Hibernians, who are loyal fubjects, be tamely and alone doomed to every expence, in men and money, which the kingdom may require, whilft the Americans are exempted from both ? join, therefore, with chearfulnels and resolution, to support the undoubted rights of your fovereign and yourfelves; exert your endeavours to supprets their rebellious proceedings in America; and treat, with honeft indignation, all those in these kingdoms, who justify their infults, and defend their caufe, as enemies to the conflitution, to your fovereign, and to the honour and welfare of the British realms in Europe. For, in whatever light the conduct of your king, his parliament, and ministry, may be reprefented by defigning men, to the eyes of integrity, on this occafion, their actions ill appear to be deferving the utmost applause a loyal and a happy people can beftow.

(

21. In the reign of king William, there feems to be nothing fimilar to the preceding conduct. The honour and the intereft of England, during that time, appear not to have been attended to with much fincerity. His exertions were to obtain money from his English subjects, to maintain the honour and the interests of the Dutch; by charter, to furrender the rights of the whole nation into the hands and tyranny of a trading company; and tamely to fuffer his British subjects to be driven from their American fettlements, by the Spaniards, when the interests of the Dutch required it.

22. Another most atrocious acculation against his majesty hath been diligently, and with frequent repetition promulged through his whole dominions,

÷.,*

ons. It is nothing lefs than that of having broken his coronation oath, in affenting to the act for making more effectual provision for the government of Quebec. Let me transcribe this oath, that the audacious injustice of this calumny may be clearly shewn to the world.

It is, "that his majefty folemnly promifes and fwears to govern the people of this kingdom of Great Britain, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the flatutes in parliament agreed on, and the laws and cuftoms of the fame."

Is not this Quebec bill a ftatute agreed on in parliament, and are not the laws and cuftoms of the Canadians those by which they are to be governed? where then is the breach in this inftance? neverthelefs, on this account, amazing clamours have been raifed, as if this law were intended to extirpate all trials by juries: than which nothing can be lefs true. At the request of the Canadians, their civil causes are to be adjudged, according to the laws and cuftoms which have always existed among them; and from which it was impracticable to deviate, without endangering, by an infinity of litigious purfuits, the claims, titles, and fecurities by which their properties had been hitherto fecured.

But refpecting the proceedings, in criminal law, "it is enacted, that the fame fhall continue to be administered, and shall be observed, as law, in the province of Quebec, as well in the defeription and quality of the offence, as in the method of profecution and trial; and the punishments and forfeitures thereby inflicted, to the exclusion of every other rule of criminal law, or mode of proceeding thereon, which did or might prevail in the faid province, before the year of our lord 1764." Thus

119 ()

Thus the penal law of England and trial by iuries, which the patriots affert to be abolished, is, by this very act, established in Canada, at the defire of the people who knew the benefits and advantages relulting from their use; for like reasons, as the former laws and mode of trial of the Canadians were preferved. Are juries then abolished in Quebec, when the fame method of trial is preferved, as in the criminal law of England? is arbitrary power extended, either in penal or civil causes, when in both inftances, the inclinations of the Canadian fubjects are complied with? from what motive then did this notorious calumny of annihilating juries and eftablishing flavery in Quebec proceed? from that infatiable luft of falfifying in the prefbyterians and other fectaries. "For, to reproach their fovereign with lying affeverations, is infeparable from fuch men, fo intimately is the fpirit of falschood amalgamated with the dross of which they are composed, that divide them, as far as matter is divisible, and a lie shall be found in every atom."

The next article is "that the king, to his power, caule the law and juffice in mercy to be executed in all his judgements." And this obligation, it fhould feem, according to the humanity of patriots, his majefty has observed with a criminal excels.

The laft article is, "that the king, to the utmost of his power, will maintain the laws of God; the true profession of the gospel; and the protestant reformed religion, as by law established: and will preferve unto the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their charge, all fuch rights and privileges, as do, or shall by law appertain unto them, or any of them."

Let

Let me now enquire, whether any thing contained in the Quebec act be repugnant to the preceding article of the coronation oath. Do thefe propagators of falfehood conceive that, by this article of his coronation oath, his majefty is obliged to maintain the church of England, as the only true profession of the gospel; and the proteftant religion, by law eftablished, through all his dominions, whether they be such as he possessed when he took that oath, or fince acquired by conquest? if that be their idea, presbyterianism must be extirpated in Scotland; the Roman Catholic religion, in Minorca; mahometanifm, and the religion of the Hindoos in Bengal, and the Carnatic. Can all this be inferred from the word maintain? it was never meant to be more than fupport. ing the church of England, where it was then eftablifhed, and is not this indifputably evinced by the fublequent particular? "that he will preferve to the bishops and clergy of this realm, and to the churches committed to their care, all fuch rights and privileges as do, or shall, by law, appertain unto them." Are the churches and temples of the dominions out of England committed to the epifcopal care? In this inflance, then, is there the minuteft caule for that atrocious calumny of infracted faith, respecting the coronation oath?

In fact, the malignity, the falfehood, the ignorance, or a combination of all these qualities, have either blinded the intellects of patriots and prefbyterians, or prevented their acknowledging, that popery and the Roman Catholic religion are not neceffarily conjoined. For certain it is, that the difcipline of a church may be changed; the fupremacy and jurifdiction imparted to another head; and yet, the articles of faith, the doctrine, the mode of worship, and the forms of prayer, may remain unaltered. tered. Such was the real ftate of things, when Harry the eighth had finished the reformation, as far as he intended it. At that time, the papal power was totally extinct in England; and the Roman Catholic remained to be the eftablished religion. In this manner, it now exists in Canada, and a reformation is begun, in that province, by his present majesty, by means as laudable, just, and humane, as the former were replete with the opposite qualities.

But let this act, respecting popery, speak for itfelf. "And for the more perfect fecurity and ease of the minds of the inhabitants of the faid province, it is hereby declared, that his majefty's jubjects, profeffing the religion of the church of Rome, of, and in, the faid province of Quebec, may have, hold, and enjoy, the free exercise of the religion of the church of Rome, fubjett to the king's supremacy, declared and established by an act made in the first year of the reign of queen Elizabeth, over all the dominions and countries which then did, or hereafter fhould belong, to the imperial crown of this realm: and that the clergy of the faid church may hold, receive and enjoy, their accuftomed dues and rights, with respect to such perfons only as shall profess the faid religion."

Hence, is it not evident, that the king's fupremacy is eftablished in Canada, and the papal abolished? And, by the act of Elizabeth, above referred to, all ecclessifical jurifdiction is annexed to the crown; and neither the pope, nor other foreign potentates, can exercise any power or authority in this kingdom. And thus his majesty is equally the supreme head of the church of Rome, in Canada, as he is of the protestant church, in England, and of presbytery, in Scotland. On those terms, these catholics can only have, hold, and and enjoy the free exercise of their religion; and then only, in fuch a manner, that no protestant is obliged to pay one farthing of the accustomed dues and rights which formerly appertained to the Roman Catholic clergy, and which the catholics muft continue to pay. In order to enjoy this toleration allo, they are obliged to take the following oath. " I A. B. do fincerely promife and fwear, that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to his majefty king George, and him will defend, to the utmost of my power, against all traiterous confpiracies and attempts whatfoever, which shall be made against his perfon, crown, and dignity; and I will do my utmost endeavour to disclose, and make known to his majefty, his heirs, and fucceffors, all treafons and traiterous confpiracies, and attempts which I fhall know to be against him, or any of them; and all this I do fwear, without any equivocation, mental evalion, or fecret refervation, and renouncing all pardons and difpensations from any power or perfon whomfoever to the contrary. So help me God."

Hence, it is indifputable, that every Canadian, taking this oath, doth folemnly depofe all that can be defired, to bind him to the defence of the king, and all that is requifite to be renounced, respecting the pope, and other potentates. His allegiance is as far acknowledged and fecured to his majelty, as the facredness of an oath can alcertain And this oath is not to be refused, but under it. the fublequent penalty; "that every perfon who shall neglect or refuse to take the faid oath, beforementioned, shall incur, and be liable to the fame penalties, forfeitures, disabilities, and incapacities, as he would have incurred, and been liable to, for neglecting or refuling to take the oath required by the the faid ftatute, paffed in the first year of the reign of queen Elizabeth." These penalties, forseitures, &tc. are, "that all offenders shall be out of the king's protection; forseit their lands and goods; be imprisoned and ransomed at the king's pleasure; and, if not to be found, they are to be outlawed."

Such are the conditions, on which alone the Canadians can enjoy their religion, and hold their lands and poffeffions; and even from these the religious orders and communities are excepted. In this manner, convents, both of men and women, must intensibly decline. No more of either fex can be fecluded in fuch retreats; becaufe no means of fultenance will remain for fuch perfons. At the fame time, with this provision to supprets monasteries, all due encouragement is given for protestants to fettle in that country. Since his majefty "can make fuch provision, out of the rest of the accultomed dues and rights of the catholic clergy, as may fuffice for the maintenance of protestant divines of the church of England, as he shall think expedient."

Such are the excellent inflitutions, contained in this law, respecting the Canadians. Popery is abolished. The bringing of any bull, order, or other pretended authority, from the papal fee, or other ftate, is attended with a præmunire. The Roman Catholic religion is fubjected to the king's fupremacy. The monattic orders muft imperceptibly decay without the cruelty of turning numbers of inoffenfive men from their abodes to starve, as it had been to inhumanly done in England. No bloody articles are inflituted, for all men to acknowledge, as by Henry the eighth. The civil laws and courts of justice of Canada are preferved; the criminal are established to be the same, and their R their causes to be tried by juries, as in England. The poffettions of laymen and ecclefiaftics are eftablifhed, excepting those of the regular clergy; for the propagation of the church of England, and the fupport of her clergy, it is amply provided. In fact, no circumftance feems to be omitted, which humanity and the christian faith can dictate: nothing enjoined, but what good polity hath fuggefted, and reason can support. And in no reign. fince this kingdom hath exifted, is there to be found one inftance, in which the wildom of the inflitution is fo perfectly united with the precepts of Chrift, and the virtues that dignify the beft of men. In this place, it is impossible to abstain from declaring that, to the immortal honour of the prelacy of this realm, they have, in the enacting of this law, afforded the most undeniable proof. that, by the doctrines which are taught in the evangelical writings, their actions have been truly directed. Among the bifhops, confilling of more than twice the number of the apofiles; but one speechprinting licariot is to be found. Such is, in fact, the true state of the Canadian statute, for which the patriots and prefbyterians fo audacioufly defame their fovereign, his ministers, and the parliament itlelf. And I shall now alk, on what pretext, effrontery can dare to affert the coronation oath has not been inviolably preferved?

22. When king William came to the throne, he took the very oath before inferted. The first article, "of governing the people according to the ftatutes, laws, and customs," he violated by keeping three thousand men in arms beyond the number limited by an express ftatute, to omit all other inftances.

The

The fecond article, "that law and justice, in mercy, were to be executed in all his judgements," was inhumanly violated by the Glenco maffacre, authorized by his own hand, and the affaffins were preferved from punishment. Such was the union of juffice and mercy in that prince, in the pardon and pension of that nefarious perjuror Titus Oates; in affenting to the bill of attainder of Sir John Fenwick; and in a multiplicity of other instances.

The third article of "the coronation oath to maintain the protestant church, established in this kingdom," was observed in the subsequent manner, in his first speech from the throne. "And as I doubt nor, fays he, you will fufficiently provide against papifts, fo I hope you will leave room for the admiffion of all protestants, that are willing and able to ferve." In confequence of this defign, a bill was brought into the house of lords, "for the abrogating of the oaths of fupremacy and allegiance, and appointing other oaths." Thus the facramental telt was to be abolished, in order to admit every kind of diffenter into place and office. But this intention was rejected by a great majority. The lords had not then forgotten, nor ever will, I truft, forget, that those very diffenters had murdered their king; driven them for being a part in the legiflature, fubverted the conftitution, ecclefiaitical and civil; fhed the blood of thoulands and ten thousands of their fellow subjects; robbed them of their patrimonies and possessions, and filled the realm with rapine, defolation, and flaughter.

This teft, fo grievoully complained against by the present sectaries, is obligatory on none but such as accept either civil or military offices. It may then alfo alfo be taken, any time within twelve months, and then omitted, on the penalty of 500l. To excufe offenders allo an act is annually paffed. And who are there, the quakers excepted, among the fwarms of fectaries, that refuse this teft, when either ambition or intereft attend the taking of it? Do they not, on ail fuch occafions, folemnly depose, on oath, rendered ftill more awful by receiving the eucharift, that the king is, alone, both head of the church and flate; then immediately abfolve themfelves from that facred obligation, and remain profeffing a contrary opinion, in both respects, during life? on the other hand, the Roman Catholics, who, as these fectaries affert, may constantly receive abtolution from their prieft, for breach of oath, and facramental teft, dare not to enter into those obligations; although to forfwear themfelves be a crime, the punifhment for which may be instantly averted by a prieft. But fuch is the difference, that, whilft every catholic refutes to take the oaths, altho' he may be abfolved by papal power, every prefbyterian is himfelf a pope, or confessor, commits the fins he likes, pronounces his own pardon, and abfolves himfelf. Such is the daily practice of all those sectaries.

R 2

A toleration, however, king William obtained for them. How well they deferve that indulgence, their prefent writings and transactions speak aloud.

When king William took the coronation oath of Scotland, he fwore to maintain the proteftant church of that kingdom, which was then epifcopal, like the reformed church of England. The impreffion which was made by that facred obligation was foon effaced from his conficience: he fpeedily abolifhed that church, and eftablifhed prefbytery in its place. To

To evince also how much the spirit of toleration actuated his conduct, a law was made, by which all perfons, educated in the catholic religion, or even suspected of it, who should succeed to any eftates, before 18 years of age, were obliged to take the oaths of inpremacy and allegiance; and the teft, as foon as they came to age. Until this was done, the effate was to devolve to the next of kin, being protestant; and to return on taking the oaths. All popifh priefts were banifhed; and, on return, adjudged to perpetual imprisonment. Burnet voted for this bill, and fays, "that if a government find any lest, in religion, incompatible with its quiet and safety, it might, and sometimes ought to send away all that fest, with as little hardship as possible." Were this doctrine now carried into a law, what a bleffed transportation would speedily take place, from this kingdom and the colonies.

Such was the difference with which the differences and the Roman catholics were then treated, although the land were ftill reeking with the blood of king and fubjects, flaughtered by the former; and with that of catholics, unjuftly put to death for a plot which never had conception, but in the heads of regicides, perjurors, and prefbyterians. At this time alfo, the intended affaffination of king Charles the fecond, at the Rye houfe, was frefh in all mens memories. By whom then has the coronation oath been violated; by your prefent fovereign, or by king William?

Such then being the true ftate of all those accufations, which the malignancy of the patriotic, and fectarian tribes have to falsely and fo injuriously propagated against their lawful king; and such the true state of facts, respecting king William, I shall now now proceed to confider both fovereigns, relative to their public and their private virtues.

1. When his majefty afcended the throne of thefe realms, the nation was involved in the most expensive war that had ever exhausted it. It was become vilible to all men of understanding, as the fate of nations no longer depends on the most powerful arm, but on the longest supply of money; that, although our fleets and armies fhould be attended with uninterrupted conqueft, the impracticability of fupplying the expence would fpeedily reduce this nation, to accept fuch terms as the vanquifhed might think fit to impose on the conqueror. The first paternal care of the king, was to attempt the re-eftablishment of peace, whilst we still preferved our afcendancy in arms. Lord Chatham, then in power, was not unknowing, that the difpolition of the English is to be eternally difpleafed with every pacification, however advantageous to their country. And that the lofs of popularity would inevitably attend whoever fhould conclude hostilities. For this, and other fecret reafons, he evaded that tafk. The ministry was foon changed, and the war purfued with more invariable fuccets than during his prefiding in public affairs. Martinico and the Havannah, in the Weit-Indies, and Manilla, in the East-Indies, were taken; besides a multiplicity of other victories too numerous to be mentioned. And through the whole conduct of the war, fince the change of ministers, every undertaking was adequate to the purpole for which it was intended. Two expeditions were not necessary for compleating the fame conqueft. Millions were not thrown away on the reducing of an illand, not worth a groat. Fortune no longer feemed to exult in elevating a minifter minister into admiration, by giving fuccess to armaments naturally difproportioned to the attempt; but victory was the refult of properly planning the expeditions, and of preparations adequate to the accomplifhment. An honourable peace was then concluded, of which we now fee the excellence and importance. From that moment, the expences were leffened, as far as it was practicable, and the debts have been fince that time diminished more than ten millions of money. The glory of the nation was never fo great among foreign potentates; the commerce of the realm never fo extenfive; nor the administration fo free from every attempt to oppress the people, or to infringe their liberties. We have no German subsidies, nor inclination to diffurb the tranquility of Europe; to exhauft our treasure; and to lavish the lives of Britons in support of alien interest.

(

1. When king William was prefented with three kingdoms, the nation was in peace. He immediately imbrued our hands in blood, and wasted our treafure to aggrandize the Dutch, and carry his vengeance into execution against Lewis the fourteenth, for oppofing his arbitrary intentions on his native country. At his accession, 2,061,856l. was the whole ium that was annually With this a civil lift, a formidable fleet, levied. and an army of almost thirty thousand men had been railed and maintained; 362,4911. were faved out of that fum, according to account given into parliament; and the nation was abfolutely unincuribered with debt. During the thirteen feffions of parliament, in king William's reign, 54,417, 7821. were raifed; in one year, 11,530,1591. and on an average, 4,185,983l. Your lands and neceffaries of life were greatly taxed, and a debt left left for us and our posterity of 17,000,000k During this time, king William was defeated in every battle, in Flanders; he won that of the Boyne, in Ireland ; and was forced to raife even the fiege of Limerick. A fcandalous peace was concluded, exclusive of the French protestants. The king had effectually loft all credit with the English, they confidered him as totally estranged from their welfare, and as one whole word was not to be believed. For these reasons, queen Anne, in her first speech, informed her parliament, "that her heart was truly English; and that they should always find ber a strift and religious observer of ber word." All the true friends of the English conflitution received intelligence of his death with pleasure; the presbyterian, sectaries, and Dutch alone, heard of it with regret. The honour and the glory of the kingdom was fo egregiously funk. that the lords, in their address to the queen, after her first speech from the throne, express, that her fpeech would have the fame effect, both at home and abroad, of equally reviving the hearts of her allies and [ubjetts. And fo much had the crown lands been leffened, by grants of king William, that, in the civil lift act, then made, the fum of 700,000*l.* a year, for that purpole, out of which, the queen annually prefented 100,000/. to the public expences, was fixed fo high, as it is faid, because the great grants made by king William had fo much decreafed the revenues arifing from the crown lands. In his reign, parliamentary corruption was begun, continued, encreafed, and entailed on the people. A ftanding army was first railed and established, and the kingdom involved in debts and continental connections; and all the neceffaries of life first loaded with the payment of So taxes.

1. So much for the public Virtues of these two princes. Since the day of his majefty's acceffion to the throne, he has fhewn his paternal care, by endeavouring to leffen the prices of the necesfaries of life. He prohibited the exportation of corn to preferve his people from famine, for which royal benignity, he was most indignantly treated; by being obliged to affent to an act, that by an ungrateful implication expressed a ftretch of his prerogative. Since that time, he hath recommended it to his parliament, to whom the redrefs of fuch grievances alone belongs. And that no remedy has been hitherto produced, is neither to be imputed to the king, nor to his ministers. For, by what means can the landed interest be induced to leffen the prices of provisions, the rents of whole estates have to augmented with that oppreffion of the people? can his majefty, by his prerogative, or his minifters, by their interest, fubdue the profligacy and leffen the diffipation of the members in both houfes; or reduce the enormous expence that luxury demands? can the effates be again divided into fmall farms; the commons reftored to the poor; the number of horfes diminished; or one instance of felfish profusion be abolished by royal or ministerial power? is it just then, to impute the continuance of the high prices of all things to our fovereign, and his fervants, who cannot oppose fuch oppreffive practices?

In every instance of private virtue, as Son, Husband, Father, Brother and Master, he stands unequalled among the race of kings; and a living example to private men. His marriage was the highest act of prudence, respecting his country. Her majesty, descended from a race of lovereigns, as ancient as any in Europe, and unallied S unallied fo nearly with any potentate, of dominions fo extensive, as that their quarrels may embroil this kingdom in hostilities, on their account, is fraught with every virtue that can adorn a woman, to whom the tongue of patriotic defamation has not dared to impute an error.

His time is paffed in council with his minifters; in reading; in the encouragement of fcience; the protection of the imitative and mechanic arts; and, perhaps, by way of avocation, fometimes in the actual exercise of them. The embellishment of his gardens give to the labourer bread, to his people pleafure; and were the virtues of this royal pair transfused through their subjects, they would render this nation the glory of humankind. They are less superior to their people by the exaltation of a throne than by that of virtue.

Through his reign, to this hour, no fymptom of a fanguinary disposition, no act of cruelty has been visible. His mercy is fo distinguished, that the remorfeles crew of present patriots charge it on him as a crime.

1. William the fecond prince of Orange, father of king William, having imprifoned fix of the provincial states, in the castle of Lovestein, marched the army of the United provinces, in the dark, infidioufly to feize the city of Amfterdam, and to enflave his country. This horrible defign was prevented by the fole accident of the Hambrough post-boy passing through the army in the night, to Amfterdam, and alarming the citizens. This faved the place, and preferved their liberty. William the third was born after his father's death. The late efcape from despotifin induced the states to enter on the refolution of eternally suppressing the office of stadsholder. During the youth of William

-, -

William the third, the fole inftructions, which he received, were imparted by John de Wit, the penfionary of Holland, a virtuous man, and a fincere friend to the republic and his country. By his intereft, the prince of Orange was made admiral and captain-general of the troops of the United Provinces. He willingly received these high offices, under the most folemn oath, of never accepting the ftadtholdership, although it should be offered him by the ftates.

Notwithstanding these obligations to that great man De Wit, who was of the Arminian faith, the prince excited the calvinistical preachers, who are ever ready for the execution of mischief, to inflame the populace against him: till, at length, they so far succeeded, as to incense the rabble to murder both John de Wit and his brother. Having thus prospered in blood and ingratitude, the prince of Orange, affisted by his calvinistical teachers, absolved himself from his oath, and affumed that statcholdership which he had so folemmly fworn never to accept.

When the French, under the command of Luxemburg, invaded the Dutch dominions on the ice, and "which, as Burnet fays, would have had a very tragical conclusion, if a happy turn of weather had not faved them." Painvine was entrufted with the command of a fmall fort, on a caufeway, through which the French must have paffed, had not the ice afforded the means of proceeding without staying to take it. Painvine, forefeeing what would be the cafe, that his defence would be useles, and being follicited to preferve another town from the enemy, retired to Tergow, to reinforce that place with the troops and cannon. The fort alfo was allowed to be untenable S 2 tenable. For this behaviour he was tried by a He pleaded, that he left that court-martial. place, on the request of one of the towns, in order to preferve it from the enemy. He was, neverthelefs, found guilty of cowardice, fentenced to have his fword broken over his head, and to be banished the dominions of the states. The prince, not fatisfied with this fentence, he was again tried by a court, composed of general officers, and they confirmed the former fentence. So far the laws of the United Provinces allowed. The prince of Orange, whole relentless foul was not to be fatisfied with lefs than human blood, in violation of the law and juffice, had him once more brought to trial before himfelf, and a court of fupreme officers. He was then found guilty, condemned and executed. By this implacable purfuit, was not William the third, prince of Orange at once the judge and the predetermined murderer? his favourite doctrine of predefination effacing every humane fenfation, and fanctifying every act of cruelty. Patriots be for ever filent, respecting Jefferies, that inhuman judge, or determine of all men according to their deferts.

From the day of his being Stadtholder, to that of his acceffion to the throne of thefe realms, he was totally engaged in fubduing the Lovestein party, and in endeavours to become abfolute in Holland. Lewis the fourteenth opposed him in all his measures, not through affection, but throinterest to preferve the United Provinces in their prefent form of government. On this account, the king of France was first detested by the prince of Orange. This detestation augmented with every defeat he received from that king, which were equal to the number of battles in which he was engaged, gaged. And there can hardly exift a more ridiculous ftory, trumped up to create his confequence, among the Englifh after an unfuccefsful campaign, than that Lewis the fourteenth had fent affaffins into the camp, to put him to death; when it was his life alone, that was fo precious to the French : fince, by a long and uniform experience, they had been taught the infufficiency of his generalfhip, and the certainty of their fuccefs, whilft he commanded. The reverfe of this they were foon taught, by the fuperior abilities of the duke of Mariborough, to create whofe importance no fictitious affaffinations were requifite to be invented.

During this time alfo, the regicides of his grandfather, those who plotted to deftroy his uncle, and every enemy to England, found afylum and protection in Holland. He engaged with Oates in that fictitious plot, for murdering the king, on which to many innocent catholics were put to death, in order to excite the populace against his father, and to exclude him from the throne. He coincided with Ruffel, Sydney, Ferguíon, and others, in the Ryehouse plot, to affaífinate the king. The two first had their attainders taken off, after his coming to the throne of Eng-Shaftefbury, Feguion, Burnet and others, land. found refuge near him; and Ferguion, the prefbyterian teacher, and Burner, the prefbyterian prelate, returned with him, when he landed in England.

James the fecond, by fuspending and dispensing with the laws; by endeavouring to obtain an abolition of the Test-act, and to admit papists, prefbyterians, and other sectaries, into all offices, civil and military; by his attempts to introduce papists into power in the universities of Oxford and and Cambridge; by his bigotry, and defigns to for overt the eftablished church, and to encrease arbitrary power, deferved to lose his crown. And he was expelled the kingdom justly. The revolution was, therefore, a bleffing to the nation. And king William ascended the throne of his confort's father, and his own uncle.

That King, in his private life, did never manifest the least love for science, literature, or arts. His pleasures were all unnatural. He delighted in blood, whether in war or peace. Slaughtering inoffensive animals, by schooting, was his chief delight in the latter; in the former, that of his fellow creatures. He was never elevated but in a day of battle; and, excepting one, he left all of them with disappointment and disgrace. He loved not the English; and in peace or war annually passed the feas to spend his time and English money in the fwamps of Holland.

The pious queen Mary entered her father's palace, intenfible to his fate: and fhewed no kind of computation on the remembrance of him, who had once inhabited it. One pious tear might have dropped and have been pardoned. Nor was fhe ever reconciled to her fifter. From hence, may it not be reafonably inferred, that tendernels of heart was not the characteriftic of that good queen, who manifelted no affection in those inflances, where nature is most prompt to exert it. Filial affection and that of a fifter were aliens to her breaft.

Such are the public and the private virtues of their prefent majefties, and of king William and queen Mary. Those of the former princes are proved by the living testimony of their daily actions, whilst all history evinces the facts which are related of of the latter. Mr. Lee may now continue in his former opinion refpecting William and Mary. The most formidable Tommy Townshend may unite with the learned counsellor, roar allegiance to dead princes, with a view to countenance their filence, respecting the living, and exert their oratoric powers against me, as often as they please. I defire no other punishment, on these gentlemen, than that they may be obliged to print their speeches.

It is a tale that has been affiduoufly propagated by the fectaries, that popery has, at all times, been attended with flavery in this kingdom; and that the prefbyterians, and other revolters from the church of England, are, and ever have been, the fast friends of freedom, and the conftitution. That the Roman Catholics are conftant perfecutors of those who, for confcience fake, diffent from their opinions; and that the latter have been, and are, the advocates for univerfal toleration and liberty of conficence. I shall prefume to examine into the truth of this affertion, from facts alone. And with that view to lay the most material transactions of both before the public, and then leave it to their determination.

In the reign of king John, both the prelates and nobles difclaimed allegiance to him; becaufe he had acknowledged his dependence on the pope, in temporal concerns. Langton, archbifhop of Canterbury, was the perfon who began, conducted, and obtained Magna Charta, in his reign; and had it again confirmed in the fubfequent. In the reign of Henry the third, the dignified ecclefiaftics difdained to fubmit to taxes impofed by the papal fee, even in contradiction to their fovereign's recommendation. And the bithop of London pronounced, "if the mitre be taken from my head, a helmet fhall inftantly fupply its place." Stratford, archbifhop archbishop of Canterbury, at the head of the clergy, in defence of those parts of Magna Charta, relative to the church, opposed the incroachments of Edward the third. In that reign, also, the parliament enacted, that none should transfer to Rome caufes appertaining to the king's court. In the reign of Richard the fecond, all those who might introduce bulls and mandates from Rome, were deprived of the king's protection, their lands and goods were forfeited, together with imprifonment and ranfom at the king's pleafure, and outlawed if not to be found. This law of præmunire was ftrengthened by Henry the fourth. The parliament, in the reign of Henry the eighth, abolifhed the papal fupremacy and jurifdiction. All these exertions, and establishments, were accomplished by Roman Catholics. So far they were the friends of civil and religious liberty, and the fteady supporters of the constitution.

With relation to fuch motives and effects, hiftory does not authorife me to deliver any thing on the part of the prefbyterians, and other diffenters from the eftablished church. I shall, therefore, proceed to shew what mischiefs have been attempted and accomplished by the Roman Catholics, and then bring parallels from the deeds of the sectaries.

When Henry the eighth and the parliament had abolifhed the papal, and eftablifhed the royal fupremacy, as the Roman Catholic religion ftill remained, but few and impotent infurrections were the confequence of that alteration; and thefe were eafily fubdued. Nothing material was excited in oppofition to the farther reformation that was made by Edward the fixth. In his reign, the ancient laws againft heretics were abrogated with great judgement; but others, fcarcely lefs fanguinary againft 'against catholics, were enacted in their place. On the afcent of Mary to the throne, the preceding laws of Edward were annulled; the Roman Catholic religion, together with the papal fupremacy, were reftored; and the laws against heretics most injudiciously revived. Thousands, whom curiofity or averfion from protestantifin, had brought to the inhuman spectacle, of christians expiring in the flames, feeing the fortitude with which they died, and admiring their conitancy in fuffering, were enthusiastically feized with perfusion, that the caule for which they expired must contain both truth and falvation. Thofe, therefore, who came catholics, returned from these inhuman executions, converted to the protestant church. That punifhment, therefore, which advances the very end which it was inftituted to deftroy, is certainly the most injudicious act of mistaken polity. During this reign, about two hundred of the church of England expired in the flames, the martyrs of their faith.

Queen Elizabeth, being feated on the throne, the nation again returned to the church, as reformed by Edward the fixth. But fuch is the confequence of reformation in religion, one constantly begets another, as if religion were intended for nothing elfe but to be mended, and greater evils may, by progreffion, arife from that caufe, than have been remedied by it in the beginning. For fuch is the invariable difpofition of zealots, and of defigning men, that the former never judging what the qualities of the human mind, the circumftances of the times, the prefervation of religion and found polity require, imagine nothing to be compleat in reformation, whilf any thing remains of the old establishment; at the fame time the latter feizing \mathbf{T} feizing the luft of innovation, and of difobedience to all power in the populace, artfully conducting it, in their criminal purfuits, under the deceptive difguife of fuperior holinefs, to those ends which ambition, interched defigns, or mere malignity of heart incite them.

In confequence of these two causes, differtions from the church of England fprang as naturally in this reign, as from the church of Rome, in the antecedent. The fame arguments were used by the latter, as by the former, in defence of their diffentions. The right of ferving God in their own way, and to be indulged in their tendernefs of confcience, had ftill the fame weight and energy; and as no intention of eminent mischief can be carried into effect, by the most refined in cunning, but by force or feduction, whenever fuch defigns are in agitation, and power is deficient, the latter becomes the fubilitute, commences and conducts the undertaking, by offering fuch propositions as bear the face of right to all but the differning, who, in fuch cafes, are always few in number: and, like Caffandra, are not believed in their predictions.

The reformers, in the reign of Edward the fixth, had renounced the Roman Catholic faith, and most piously configned their ancestors to the devil, for being idolaters. The puritans, for such they were first called, paid the like compliment to the living; denominated all that remained of rites, ceremonies, and worship of the ancient religion in the reformed church to be idolatry; and, with like piety, fentenced these professions of the new faith to the infernal regions also. In this manner reformation as spontaneously grew out of reformation, as one polype from another, and as regularly became new existencies. The tenets, on which they they differed and contended, were all founded in truth, and warranted by fcripture. The gospel was explained by every man, according as it beft might ferve his purpole; a multiplicity of fenfes were found to be in the fame text, and every one was a perfect judge of the truth and rectitude of what he read. By these means, every individual was right in his own opinion; and every man wrong, that differed from him: and thus being all right, as they confidered themfelves, and all. others wrong, as they were confidered by them; all were right, and all wrong, at the fame time. The principles, which were adopted by thefe puritans, were not examined by the criterion of human judgement, in order to determine, whether they would tend to the improvement of true religion, morality and virtue; but by that which every crafty and infidious knave could twift the fcriptures to express, and to serve the purposes of most effectually feducing the populace.

The doctrines of Calvin, mixed with fanaticism, are irrefiftable. Zeal is the sharpened wedge, and predeffination that tremendous weight which drives through all opposition. These were adopted by the puritans, and applied progreffively to all the purposes of national destruction. Leicester, Walfingham, Cecil, and others, were puritans at heart, and patrons of them openly. Thefe principles were countenanced as beft adapted to support their defigns on the church lands, which were left unpillaged by Henry the eighth, of which Leicefter and others obtained confiderable portions. Thele men ruled Elizabeth. Laws were enacted, which made it high treason, for a subject, born in England, to return a prieft from beyond the feas to his native country. It was made treason, either to convert convert another, or to be converted by him. It was felony, alfo, to entertain, fecrete, or any ways affift a Roman Catholic prieft.

(142)

By these fanguinary statutes, as many priests, of the Roman Catholic faith, have been drawn, hanged, cut up alive; their hearts torn from their bodies, whilf palpitating in the executioner's hand, and thrown into the flames; their members fevered, and exposed on the public places, in which they fuffered, as there were protestants that perished in the flames of Mary. Thefe victims had committed no other crime than that of being priefts, and preaching their doctrines, like Augustin, who first promulged the same christian faith, and establifhed that religion, for which they died, among our anceftors. Not a man of them, when afked, but would have willingly complied with taking any oath of allegiance to the reigning prince, in all temporal affaire. Not a man would take it in ecclefiaftical, on the terms of life, fincerely offered, when racks, in prifon, ftretched him agonifing in torture, nor when the inftruments of execution and lighted fires were prefent to his eyes. One of these victims, whole name was Tunital, when the long detail of drawing, hanging, cutting down alive, ripping open, burning and difmembering, was pronounced, heard it with that refolution which a perfect confciousness of being right can alone inspire; and inftantly replied, well, my good lord, this whole dreadful fentence imports but one death. Words which express a fublimity of fentiment, and fuperiority of foul, that nothing has exceeded. or can exceed. Many, allo, who entertained them, perified by the hands of the public hangman. For thefe puritanical flatefinen had, by law, converted every laudable tenfation of the heart, and act of humanity, humanity, in parents, brothers, fifters, relations, friends, into felony and death.

(443))

Such was the ministerial infliction: but by prefbyterian principles men are not made martyrs, but perfecutors. Religion is their inftrument of mischief, not their guide to salvation. Their faith, respecting the obligations of an oath, is taken from two lines in Hudibras:

'Tis he, that breaks the oath, who makes it, Not he, who for convenience takes it.

It is uniformly feen, that hang but felf-intereft, or even the paultry honour of a mayoralty or fherifffhip before their eyes, or put their property in danger, their confciences are diffended with the utmost facility; and no oath is too large to be taken down; of fuch fingular ftuff are they composed, they dilate like a viper fwallowing a toad. And when none of the preceding objects are offered, the fmallest grain is too large to find admitance into fuch tender confciences.

Such was the parliamentary infliction of a puritanical ministry against the Roman catholics, whose plea of perfevering in that religion, which had sublisted to many ages, and was first promulged among the English; was, on that account, more strong than that for innovating and diffurbing the church so lately established, and which, at length, subverted the constitution both civil and religious. In this manner, puritanical cruelty was exercised through the reign of that queen. At length, the faw to what excess that fanatic and infidious race were extending their defigns. She felt the ill effects of their principles, and enacted laws to suppress them also. But these, in like manner, were injudiciously formed. The evil was thereby augmented, and the then too late, forefaw the fanguinary calamities which they would one day inflict on this deluded nation.

(144)

When James the first acceded to the crown of England, he brought from Scotland a thorough deteilation of the prefbyterians, from whole machinations he had almost miraculously escaped. His opinion of them is beft known from his own words, in his BASIAIKON $\Delta\Omega$ PON, written to his fon; "Take heed, therefore, my fon, to fuch puritans, very pefts in the church and commonwealth; whom, no deferts can oblige, neither oaths nor promifes bind, breathing nothing but fedition and calumnies. Alpiring without meafure; reviling without reafon; and making their own imaginations, without any warrant of the word, the fquare of their confciences, I proteft, before the great God, and fince I am here as upon my teflament, it is no time for me to lie in, that ye shall never find with any highland or border thieves, greater ingratitude, and more lies and vile perjuries, than with these fanatic spirits. And fuffer not the principles of them to brook your land, if ye like to fit at reft." Such they were, in those days; such they are at present. The fatal effects which they produced in the reign of Charles the first, loudly pronounced, that no vigilance nor exertion of legal power, either by laws, already, or to be, made, can exceed the emergency of the prefent difpofitions of thefe men, who profefs themfelves to be of fimilar principles, and are engaged in like purfuits.

James, who abhorred the prefbyterians, was not difinclined to the Roman Catholics. Cecil, his minifter, a prefbyterian at his foul, beheld this propenfity propenfity with pain; and wifhed to effrange his fovereign's heart from those he liked. At this time, the most nefarious defign of blowing up, by means of gun-powder, king, lords and commons, was undertaken by about fourteen of the papifts. The intention was discovered by fuch means, and prevented in fuch a manner, that it is not without probability that the prefbyterian, Cecil, had contrived this execrable undertaking, by fecretly practifing on a few fiery bigots of the papal church; in order, by those means, to avert the inclinations of James from his Roman catholic fubjects. Among these, Garnet, the Jesuit, suffered death. His crime was, not revealing this defign, which had been imparted to him in confession. I pretend to no excuse for this Jesuit's conduct. But certainly being, by his religious office, under the most folemn obligation not to reveal what was confessed to him, he had a better plea than Burnet, whom I conftantly confider as a prefbyterian priest. He, good man, left England, to seek an afylum in Holland; because he certainly knew what was intended, and feared that the undertaking then on foot was premature: for he fays, "He thought the beft thing for him to do was to go out of the way beyond fea. This gave him great credit with all the malcontents, and he made the best use of it he could." After this avowal, he that will not conclude that Burnet, by difregarding his oath of allegiance and not revealing what he knew, who had no excufe, from vows or oaths to the contrary, and by encouraging those he did, was not as great a villain, and merited death as much as Garnet, must find more coercive arguments than I have hitherto difcovered.

The

The contrivers of this exectable intention received that punishment which was justly due to them. But by the most diligent fearch it was found that no other Roman catholic was concerned in that plot; no arms were collected, nor military preparations made; to that no confequence, in favour of papifts, could have been derived from that horrible intention. It is difficult, therefore, to decide whether the folly or the iniquity be most enormous in that fanguinary pursuit. For, had the event taken place, would it not have proved more fatal to the Roman catholics than to the reft of the kingdom? for who can doubt that in the first impulses of vindictive rage, they had perifhed by the hands of the protestants? This plot, the council of Cecil, and the prefbyterian intereft in Scotland prevailed on James to perfecute and put to death numbers of Roman catholic priefts, whofe whole crime was folely that of being of the priefthood, and preaching their doctrines for confcience fake, the very thing thefe prefbyterians claimed as the original rights of humankind.

Notwithstanding James the first was animated with fuch aborrence of the prefbyterians, his pedantic and diffutations fpirit, and his affectation of being a profound Theologist, facilitated the means that brought his fon to the block. In fact. he adopted the most egregious error that a fovereign can commit, respecting such diffentions as may arife from a church eftablished. He fuffered the clergy to enter into conferences and disputes with the prefbyterian teachers. Whereas he should have known that in fuch affemblies neither truth nor reason have power to subdue enthusiasm and change the opinions of the controvertifts. Motives of a contrary nature and too powerful to be be overcome by argument, animate their hearts and diffutations. They are kindled into greater refentment againft each other, and from that impulle feparate with more averfion; and therefore, are lefs open to conviction than when they met. No converts are made by fuch diffutes. At the fame time, by indulging the prefbyterians with those conterences, the king imparted a consequence to their cause; and afforded reason to suggest, that it contained something which deferved a resultation. All such proceedings are destructive of the end to which they are intended, and unwarrantable by manly and found polity.

James being dead, his fon Charles legally affumed the sceptre of the three kingdoms. During the two preceding reigns, the puritans had encreafed in number, and in riches. Thefe circumftances augmented their power, and inflamed their They were now no longer the humble infolence. fuitors, for confcience take, to be permitted to worship God in their own way. They entered on the retolution and the means of demolifhing every object which might refift their defigns, whether it were ecclefiaffical or civil. The king, and the house of lords, religion and the laws, were alike to be abolished. They were conficious, however, that their machinations mult prove abortive, unless fome fpecious plan were deviled to create a difcontent between the fovereign and his fubjects. Without that aid, on what pretext could they commence those mischiefs which they had projected. But in learch of that affiftance, they were not long employed. In the last year of the reign of James, they had urged him to a war with Spain and the emperor; they then gave him a supply; and a petition against popery was prefented to the throne.

U

James.

Tames being dead, and the nation thus involved in hostilities, a parliament was called, in which the prefbyterian members exceeded in number those of the established church. They soon discovered their ftrength. On this their defigns broke violently forth, and they immediately began to carry their feditious intentions into action. With this view they refolved not to fettle the revenues of tonnage and poundage on the king, beyond a year; and refused to grant such supplies as were adequate to the fupporting of that war which they had, in fact, begun. In this dilemma, to which they had reduced their fovereign, they poured complaints of grievances, and made no provision for the civil lift, nor for fuffaining the war. The king perceiving their defigns, and that nothing but feditious purpofes were intended, diffolved the parliament; and, by his fole authority, ordered his officers to continue in collecting the duties which had been ufually fettled on his predeceffors. Another parliament was called, in the following year. and this, proceeding in a like manner, it was diffolved, as the former had been, and for like reafons. A third parliament was again called, and filled with the fame men, or others of fimilar prin-They greedily feized on the king's raifing ciples. money by his own authority, as illegal and arbitrary, although by their premeditated refulal of fupplies, he had been compelled to it; and that itwas not unprecedented. On this event, they formed a petition to the king, which contained fuch articles as were reasonably to be asked, and which could not be refused without displeasing the people. These were, that no loan or tax might be levied without confent of parliament; that no man might be imprifoned but by legal process; and a few

149 ()

To these the king answered, "I will, few others. that right be done, according to the laws and cultoms of the realm." But this was received as inadequate to what they expected. They again petitioned for a more latisfactory answer. His majefty then gave his full affent, according to the usual form in parliament: but their system was, never to be fatisfied with any return to what they afked, and confequently they refolved on prefenting a remonstrance against the king's having received tonnage and poundage. This defign being known, his majefty came to the house, paffed the acts, which confirmed the rights and liberties, for which they petitioned, together with fome others, and then prorogued the parliament.

It affembled again in the fame year. The commons immediately began on the late fubject, of the illegality of tonnage and poundage. The king informed them, in his speech, that he did not claim it of right, but de bene effe; or, for the public welfare; and defired it might be fettled on him, as it had been on his anceftors. No attention was paid to this requeit. They not only continued the complaints on the grievances of administration, but now no longer talked of liberty of confcience, to ferve God in their own way; but erected themfelves into an inquifition; enquired into, and condemned that liberty in others, who were equally entitled to it with themfelves; and debated concerning the increase of Arminianism and popery. Pym, alfo, moved in the house, that they should engage in a covenant to maintain their rights and religion'. They then refolved to proceed on affairs relative to religion, before they entered on the confideration of the tonnage and poundage. And Cromwel informed U 2 informed the houfe, that popery was countenanced by the bifhop of Winchefter.

The speaker of the commons, being called upon by the house, to read a remonstrance, he refufed to comply with it; when endeavouring to leave the chair, he was held in it by force, the doors were locked, and the subsequent protestation "That whoever fhould bring in innowas read. vations in religion, or feek to introduce popery or Arminianifm, should be accounted enemies to the kingdom." It feems difficult to decide, whether the effrontery of this protestation be greater, in their interdicting innovations in religion, who were then labouring to innovate, by eftablishing calvinifm in the place of the church of England; or in denying that liberty of conficience to others, which they themfelves afferted was the right of all mankind. On this, the king diffolved the parliament.

The fpirit of intolerance increased amongst those prefbyterians, exactly with their powers of carrying it into execution. Every thing was popery that remained, either in form of worthip or of prayer. The mitre, the furplice, a burning taper, a piece of painted glass, were deadly fins and remnants of idolatry. All were to be abolished as odious to God, in order to effect a godly thorough reformation. At the fame time, they converted the very effence of christianity to the most infernal purpofes. They prefumed to feek the lord in prayer, to grant them fuch things as no being but the devil could hear, without horror. They role from their knees, afferting it was obtained. They applied the wrathful texts of the Jewifh theocracy, pronounced against idolaters, to the church established, and converted Chrift himfelf to become an inftrument.

(151)

ftrument of their impious defigns, by calling him their king Jefus. All this they afferted to be undertaken in fupport of that gofpel, which teaches charity to all mankind, and even forgivenefs to our enemies. No falfehood was too flagrant for their affirmation; no deed too cruel for their undertaking, provided the tendency of them were to promote their abominable purpofes. Two things there were, befides the levying of tonnage and poundage, that afforded too much caufe for their feeking the abolition of them: Thefe were the courts of high commiffion, and Star-chamber.

During this time, the Scotch prefbyterians were equally engaged in like rebellious transactions. They entered into a folemn league and covenant against the episcopal church, established in Scotland, and to erect calvinifm. In 1640, the parliament met, and immediately returned to their late grievances in religious and temporal affairs. It is again diffolved; but the suppression of the Scottifh rebellion requiring fupplies, which could not be raised without a parliament, another was called in the fame year. On the 3d of November, began the feffion of that parliament, which, before its diffolution, entirely fubverted the conftitution, in church and ftate; and exercifed fuch unremitting tyranny, and acts of barbarilm, as were even a difgrace to rebellion. All this was done for confcience fake, for the liberty of worfhipping God in their own way, and for establishing the throne of king Jelus.

The fame grievances were again urged by the commons. Pym carried up an impeachment against the carl of Strafford. He is committed to the custody of the black rod. Pennington, a prefbyterian alderman of the city of London, followed by

(152)

by a tumultuous populace, carried a petition, as from the city, against the discipline and ceremonies of the church; and foon after, with a like riotous attendance, he prefents another for the abolition of epif-The commons then refolved that the copacy. convocation had no right to make cannons; that the fubfidies which they granted were illegal; and framed a bill for fining all that fat in that affembly. And yet, all thefe rights exifted in the clergy, long before the house of commons had a being, and had uniformly continued to make a part of the conftitution of England to that day. Never were impudence, falsehood, and hypocrify, fo perfectly combined as in the fanatic commons of those days. Archbithop Laud was now impeached of high treason, by Danzel Hollis, taken into the custody of the black rod, and, foon after committed to the tower. And in this manner, the earl of Strafford, and this prelate, the chief supporters of the church and ftate, and of greateft abilities and refolution, were taken from the king, and imprifoned.

A bill for triennial parliaments was, at that time, the fubject of great clamour by the prefbyterians, as it is at prefent. That bill then meant only that the king fhould not difcontinue a meeting of parliament more than three years. This act was paffed. The commons, with thanks to his majefty, declared, that nothing now remained, but to teftify their devotion to him, and to make him a glorious king. We fhall foon fee of what ftuff their devotion was composed, and the means they purfued to make their fovereign glorious.

One act of their devotion was to refolve, that no bishop should have a vote in parliament. Another was to keep the Scotch army in pay; and to borrow money money of the city of London on the fublidies, which was an act equally arbitrary and illegal with that of the king's levying tonnage and poundage by his own authority. There was now an undoubted rebellion in the kingdom : in fact, it had already long fubfifted. But the king fatally deferred to arm, and to defeat it. The articles of impeachment against lord Strafford were unequal to the acculation, for if all of them could have been proved, they could amount to nothing like high treafon. They therefore despifed the regular proceedings of juffice, proceeded by bill of attainder, and framed a law expressly made to put him to death, guiltles of the charge; which, on that account, was as equally a murder, as if the fame prefbyterians had affaffinated him in the ftreet.

Notwithstanding this parliamentary outrage on the constitution, these fanatics, "whom no king can govern, and no God can pleafe," headed by one Cornelius Burgefs, followed by a mob, came riotoufly to the houfe of commons, exclaiming, justice, justice, against the earl of Strafford. For murder was justice, in the opinion of a presbyterian teacher, at that time, as it appears to be in that of Prieftley in the prefent. They infulted the king, and when the justices of the peace attempted to commit the most audacious of them to prison, the commons interposed, and committed the justices, for acting in defence of their fovereign and the laws, against his rebellious subjects. In this way, they proved themfelves to be at his devotion, and making him a glorious king.

The day was now arrived, fraught with ruin to the conftitution. The king, oh fatal and imprudent deed! figned the paper that appointed the commission, by which the bill of lord Strafford's attainder attainder was paffed in the houfe of lords, and another, that the parliament fhould not be diffolved without the confent of the commons. Such was the iffue of obtaining a triennial parliament. By thefe acts, he, in fact, fubfcribed his own death warrant; and the hand that figned thefe papers, I had almost faid, deferved to have that head, which belonged to it, taken from its fhoulders by an axe.

And now it was visible, that those presbyterian commons, those friends of the people, these protectors of their rights and liberties, had not only prevailed on the king to renounce his lawful right of proroguing and diffolving parliament; but that they had robbed their fellow-fubjects alto of their right of a general election, and of being represented by any other than that which was then fitting. For this parliament never diffolved itself, until the restoration of Charles the fecond. May this precedent, fo fatal, fo fanguinary, and deitructive, prevent both the fovereign to yield to any application from fectarian fubjects, and the people from abetting their machinations. For it is as certain, that the king shall suffer, by indulging their petitions, and the people be deprived of their rights and liberties, by men of such principles, as that the fun shall rife to-morrow. And believe me, although at the day of judgment they fuffer for their transgreffions, yet, neither wildom, nor chriftan patience ought to remit to that day of doom the punifhment which they fo truly merit.

The king then passed a bill, by which he renounced all right of levying tonnage and poundage, by his prerogative, or on any merchandile whatloever; another to annihilate the courts of high commitfion, and of the Star-chamber; and one also of pacification between England and Scotland, by which

which the demands of all the prefbyterian Scots were granted. Here every purfuit of the house of commons ought to have terminated. The levying of money, by prerogative-royal, the courts of high commission, and Star-chamber, were abolifhed; and liberty of conficience was no longer opposed. But these envenomed sectaries resolved to proceed until the whole conflictution of the flate were perfectly demolished. Every concession of the king was a fresh incentive for proceeding to new demands. And in this manner it will eternally refult, when fovereigns yield to the petitions of men who are, by principle, implacable, but with the death of that man who shall give credit to their hypocritical applications, and yield his affent to their infidious undertakings.

Every moment expedited the ruin of the king, in which no man was more inftrumental than himtelf. He confented to the abolition of epifcopacy in Scotland. He difmiffed colonel Lunsford from the lieutenancy of the tower, on the application of the commons, that they could not confide in him; and fir John Byron was placed in his ftead. Twelve of the bifhops protected against all acts passed in parliament fince they were withheld from fitting in the house of lords. They were committed by the parliament to the tower, as guilty of high treason.

The treasonable correspondence being discovered, between the prefbyterian commons and the Scots, the king ordered Kimbleton, Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Hassering and Stroud to be apprehended. The commons resolved to stand on their defence. The king demanded the members abovenamed in their house. They were absent. The commons voted that demand to be a breach of privilege, and the city mob was raised to protect them.

 \mathbf{X}

At

At this time, his majefty and the royal family being exposed to great danger, retired to Hampton-Court.

The prefbyterian fheriffs of London, accompanied with the train-bands, and the populace, in arms, carried back the demanded members in triumph to Weftminfter; whilft the feamen and watermen, in boats, equipped with field-pieces, proceeded, from London Bridge to the fame place. They were thanked by the commons and promifed an ordinance for their indemnity.

Nothing is fo fatal to a fovereign as temporizing with rebels. It was now different how erroneoufly the king had conducted himfelf, in fuffering there prefbyterian fubjects of King Jefus to proceed in violating the conflictution, affifted by his own affent. Whilft they were openly diffegarding all legal obligation, and preparing to deftroy him by arms, his majefty imprudently conceiving that fuch implacable demanders were to be fatisfied by granting what they afked, neglected fuch military preparations as could alone, in those days, and can, in the prefent, prevent the deftructive purposes on which they always meditate; and which they will omit no probable opportunity of carrying into execution.

Sir John Byron, not answering the intention of the commons, they petitioned the king to deliver up to them the tower; and to place the fortreffes and militia of the kingdom in their hands. Byron was difmiffed and Sir John Conyers made lieutenant of the Tower. Thus his majefty confented to difarm himfelf.

Charles, by commission, passed the bill that deprived the bishops of their right of voting in parliament; and incapacitated the clergy from exercifing any jurifdiction in temporal concerns. (

The king, refusing to put the militia into the hands of the commons, they immediately affumed that power. They demanded the difmiffion of his ministers, as evil counfellors, and even to have the prince in their cuftody. They refolved to put the nation in a state of defence, that the lords lieutenant fhould bring to the house their commiffions, and cancel them as illegal. And that the admiral should prepare a fleet, and proceed to fea in their fervice. The king fat up his standard, and prepared for defeating those rebels, by the power of arms, which he had too long and too fatally neglected, whilft they were haftening to that means of dettroying him.

During the preceding part of this reign, but three Roman catholic perfons had fuffered death, for being of that priefthood. The prifons were, indeed, thronged with perfons of that religion, both ecclefiaftics and laymen; but, with the increase of power among the presbyterian commons, the fpirit of perfecution proceeded with equal steps. The catholic priefts were now to be brought to the gallows, for exercifing their right of ferving God in their own way. Goodman, a priest, was condemned to die. The king, in mercy, applied to the commons to fave his life, and be fatisfied with his being imprifoned or banifhed. The lords and commons confered and joined in a petition to the king, that Goodman be executed, and the laws put in execution against all priefts, and jefuits. Blood alone can fatisfy the tender confcience of a presbyterian. His majesty, however, did not conient to Goodman's death. He died in Newgate, among felons. The king refolved to commit no more fuch cruelties; and refused to fign the warrants of leven priefts, condemned at one time to death, at the

X 2

the Old-Bailey. The prefbyterians then, feeing it in vain to feek the fanction of the royal name to countenance their perfecuting refolves, affumed the full power of life and death; and a number of men, whole whole crimes were being priefts, were executed with all the feverity of that inhuman fentence, which condemns to be hanged, cut down alive, emboweled, and hearts to be thrown into the flames. Such was the tendernels of the prefbyterian commons, who were at that inftant roaring against the Roman catholic perfecutions in the reign of bloody Mary. This mercy, conftantly unpardonable in a king, that is not their favourer, was published through the realm, as a proof of his majefty's being a bloody papift, and of their being the true friends of Chrift's golpel. Their perfecuting fpirit, for conficence lake, was fo exercifed in 1641, that they executed two priefts, and fentenced feveral others to death. This had a double effect. It withheld the merciful difpolition of the king from urging the Roman catholics to join his standard, through apprehension, that all of that religion would thereby fuffer, who might fall into the hands of the rebels. And the catholics were fo intimidated by these fanguinary proceedings of the prefbyterians, that, feeing there remained no other method to preferve themfelves and their effects, some few of them opposed the king, whom they liked, and affifted the prefbyterians, whom they had reafon to deteft, In the religion of fuch catholics, rebellion effaced the fin of idolatry. For, in fact, it was loyalty to their fovereign, that was the fole caufe of all the fanatic lies, groundlefs charges, and barbarous punifhments, which were urged againft all men of the church of England, and Roman catholics.

(159)

ŧ

catholics. And to promote that malignancy, the caule of Jelus was let up against their lawful king.

The parliament now voted, that whoever fhould raife forces for their fovereign, were to be deemed traitors. And they published a remonstrance, declaring, that the supreme legislative authority was in the two houses: and that the king had no right of withholding his affent from the acts they passed. They now committed the very crime, from which their rebellion had originated, and issued an ordinance, by their fole authority, for levying tonnage and poundage. They passed another ordinance also for assessed. for the maintenance of their forces against their fovereign: which, they impudently afferted to have been raised for his prefervation.

The prifoners, taken at Brentford, being releafed by the king, on having fworn not to take arms any more againft him, Downing and Marfhal, two prefbyterian teachers, who had been conftantly roaring againft the pope, as the idolatrous whore of Babylon, affumed that very power which they had fo vehemently execrated; and abfolved all those released prifoners' from their oaths, who, again, engaged in the rebel army, through pure tendernels of confcience.

The church of England was now demoiifhed. An affembly of prefbyterian teachers was conflituted to fettle the national religion, on the calvinifical principles, doctrines and difcipline; and the two houles, and the city of London, united with the Scots, in taking the folemn league and covenant.

The presbyterian, being now the eftablished church, by ordinances of rebellion, their teachers laboured to erect a government therein, which was to contain the very powers, they had abolifhed, as too delpotic. Such as, those of the keys, and of excommunication. Epifcopacy was exterminated ; the church lands were alienated, to pay the debts incurred by the two houses; and the benefices diftributed to their teachers, from whence the clergy of the church of England were expelled. And now, these presbyterian teachers denied that liberty of confcience to all other lefts, as well as to the churchmen of England, and they claimed both civil and ecclefiaftical authority over mens perfons, properties, and confciences. The fpirit of perfecution thirsted for this power, in order to fupprefs all who differed in opinion from themfelves. They infifted on a ftrict uniformity in discipline, faith and worfhip; and vehemently inveighed against toleration, which the independents, their natural fpawn, determined to support. They even haraffed the house of commons to grant them fuch powers as might enable them to compel, by perfecution, those who should prefume to diffent from covenant uniformity, and the divine This the independents, in right of prefbytery. parliament, did in fome measure prevent from being strictly established. The directory was enjoined, as the rule of worfhip, in all churches, under a pecuniary fine, for each Sunday's omiffion. Whoever should presume to speak or act against it was fined from five to fifty pounds. The Common-Prayer was forbidden, not only in churches, but in private families, under a like penalty. Every clergyman of the church of England must take the covenant, or be ftripped of his living, and fent, with his family, to starve : and then an ordinance of the two houles, unprecedented among chriftians, was made the 2d of May 1648, against herely and blasphemy. Among a variety 07 of articles, these that follow are to be seen. That whoever shall affirm, that the Godhead and manhood of Christ are not distinct natures; that the death of Christ is not meritorious; that the scriptures are not the word of God; that Chrift is not rifen; that there is no refurrection, or a future judgment; shall suffer death, as in cases of felony. And then, that whofoever fays, that all men shall be faved; that man, by nature, hath free-will to turn to God; that man is bound to believe no more than by his reafon he can comprehend; that the baptism of infants is unlawful; shall be conimitted to prilon, till they can find fecurity, that he would not either maintain or publish such errors. Such was the lust of eftablishing absolute dominion, by what was then called the legislature. By this ordinance, the churchmen of England, Papifts, Arminians, Antinomians, Arians, Socinians, Anabaptifts, and all other fectaries, then exifting, were doomed to perfecution.

(160)

The virulence of this presbyterian ordinance deftroyed the end for which it was intended. The independents revolted from them, and became their mafters. They were universally detefted by all men of every other religion, or fect, for their attempting to eftablish this tyranny on conscience. And this detestation alone induced them to assume the affectation of tenderness for the king's life, when they faw their tyrannical fystem disappointed by the independents. These were the bleffed seekers of the Lord, who transported themselves to Boston, in which place they purfued the dictates of the fame perfecuting fpirit, and put to death those who dared to diffent from them. In fuch principles they have perfevered, and fuch they are now exercifing ercifing against the lawful authority of their fovereign and his parliament.

Pym, nicknamed king, by the mob, perifhed by the loufy evil. Thus perifh all fuch rebels to their king.

Archbishop Laud, being deemed by the lords to be not guilty of high-treason, the prefbyterian commons commanded him before them; and without hearing any evidence, fave that which was repeated by their counfel, they attainted him of high treason, for which he was beheaded. And now the courts of high commission and Star-chamber, abolished in name, existed in reality. The first, in the Calvinistical church government; the fecond in the house of commons: and thus the legislative power, and that of executing the laws, were united in the fame inhuman beings.

And now, that abominable hypocrify, hitherto inferted by order of the parliament, in commissions to their generals, to preferve kis majefty's perfon, was omitted in that to Fairfax.

I purpofely decline from all defcription of those calamities which attended this infernal rebellion, in which fathers were flain by fons, and fons by fathers; in which all ties, parental and filial, by confanguinity and marriage, of friend, of religion, and of humanity itlelf, were totally annihilated. Defolation, rapine and flaughter, were let loofe to ravage; and every horrible act that fanaticifm could devife, was perpetrated, with all imaginable fury.

At this time, the commons refolve, under God, that the people were the original of all just power. That the commons, in parliament, had the fupreme authority of the nation, without king or house of peers. Thus, as the commons were established tablished to all eternity, unless diffolved by force, or by their own consent, every right in the constituents of electing a new parliament was extirpated, together with those of the king and peerage; and the government was become an oligarchy.

The king, driven to diffrefs, repaired to the Scotch prefbyterian army, in fearch of an afylum. These loyal subjects fold him to his English rebels, for 400,000*l*.

The English presbyterians, in refentment to the independents, for stripping them of power, now affected a tenderness for the king's life. Cromwel, confcious of the true motive, ridiculed their hypocrify. His majesty was then brought before a felfcreated high court of justice; he difavowed their authority; was arraigned and fentenced to be beheaded, as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public robber, and then they murdered him, at Whitehall, on the 30th of January, 1648.

Hence it may be feen, by what fatal progression, from the pretence of feeking the liberty of ferving God in their own way; from tenderness of confcience; from opposing some few acts of extended prerogative, together with abolishing of the courts of high commission and star-chamber, eftablished by law, and annulled by the king's confent; that virtuous motives never actuated the hypocritic bofoms of those infidious fanatics. Every thing conceded was an incentive to more arrogant demands. By his remiffnefs maturely to prepare, by force to fubdue their rebellious intentions, the rights of fovereign and of fubject were alike demolished, and the kingdom was covered with human blood, and with oligarchic defpotifm.

Y

God

God preferve his majefty; and may the people fay, Amen.

The commons now refolved, that a king, or the power thereof, in one perfon, was unneceffary, burthenfome, and dangerous, and therefore to be abolifhed: and an act was paffed in both houses, by which fuch abolition was confirmed.

Things being thus far advanced, Cromwel entered the houle of commons, with a file of mulqueteers; commanded the speaker to quit the chair; told them, they had fat long enough, unlefs they had done more good; and that they were no longer a parliament. He told Harry Vare, that he was a juggler; Henry Martin, and Peter Wentworth, that they were whore-mongers; Tom Challoner, a drunkard; and Allen, a public cheat. And ordered a common foldier to take away the mace, that fool's bauble. Harrifon then pulled the speaker from the chair: which being done, and all of them kicked out, Cromwel locked the doors, and in the afternoon, difmified the council of state, which had been appointed foon after the royal murder.

Oliver, with his council of officers, now affumed the fupreme authority of the kingdom and diffolved the parliament by their declaration. He then iffued his orders, nominated and convened about one hundred and twenty perfons, who met him at Whitehall. He then told them, they had a clear call to undertake the fupreme authority of the commonwealth. And then, by an inftrument, under his own hand, with the advice of his officers, he committed the fupreme authority to that 120 men, July the 4th, 1653. They were to fit no longer than till the 3d of November, 1654. And three months before the expiration of their feffion, they were to felect an an equal number of others to fucceed them; whole duration was not to exceed a year. He then, by way of fpiritual compliment, affured them, he had not made choice of one perfon, in whom he had not the good hope that he had faith in Jefus Chrift, and love to all faints. Which faints were those who had fpread defolation and bloodshed in the cause of rebellion and murdered their fovereign.

This affembly refolved, that no perfon should be admitted to any place or office in the government, unlefs the parliament, as they called themfelves, were fatisfied of his real goodnefs. These 120 elect of Cromwel were, in derifion, fometimes called the godly parliament; at others, Praifegod Barebone's parliament. That honourable member was a feller of leather, a speaker of speeches; and no lefs formidable than the unmerciful Tommy Townshend. It was the opinion of these felect men, that Chrift would foon defcend to reign in England. And, in order to purge the kingdom of iniquity, and prepare the way for him, they propofed to extirpate all parfons and lawyers; to abrogate all laws, and badges of flavery; to fupprefs all schools and universities, as heathenish inventions; together with all titles of honour and diftinctions among men : and they actually proceeded to abolifh the courts of chancery. And now, may it not be faid, that these fanatics had made a thorough reformation, whatever might become of its godlinels?

This parliament of Praife-God Barebones, confifted of fuch fools, intentionally felected, to answer Cromwel's purposes. About five months after they began to fit, they had rendered themfelves fo conformately ridiculous, that Oliver now thought he might fafely proceed in his ascendancy to fupreme power.

Y 2

Accordingly, it was moved in the house, power. that the welfare of the commonwealth required they fhould fit no longer: and that it was fit they should refign their power to the Lord General. On this motion, the speaker, with many of the members, repaired to Whitehall: and, by a written inftrument, refigned their power into the hands of Cromwel. Some of the members still remained with Barebones in the houfe. Cromwel never did things by halves, or with hefitation. He immediately fent White, an officer, with foldiers, to the house of commons, which having entered, they demanded to what intent they were fitting there. To feek the Lord, was the answer. Pish, replied White, the Lord has not been within these walls thefe twelve months: and then turned them all out.

Lambert, and the council of officers alfo, refigned their pretentions to power, and declared, that the government of the commonwealth fhould refide in a fingle perfon; and that Oliver Cromwel fhould be that perfon, with the title of Lord Protector of the commonwealth of England, Scotland and Ireland, and all the other dominions thereunto belonging.

Cromwel was now fole fovereign of three powerful kingdoms, without either lords or commons, to incommode his undertakings. Such was the refult of feeking the Lord to murder their king, and of liberty of confcience to fubvert the conftitution. Oliver was a man formed by nature to apply the principles of those implacable fectaries, to perpetrating the deeds of that fanguinary æra. He lost not his time in speculative defigns, which most frequently prove abortive; but caught occafions as they role, dared to be equal to what they offered, and probably attained to that amazing degree gree of fovereignty, becaule he difcerned not to what height he was afcending before he reached the fummit. Few men of exalted virtue have, at any time, been capable of great refolution. There have been, indeed, numbers of them poffeffed of paffive fortitude to a furprifing excess. Thousands with the utmost firmness, have died martyrs to religion, for one who, by active virtue, has dared to fave his country, without being animated by the interested ambition of acquiring dominion for himfelf. Sovereigns that would imitate Oliver in every thing but his crimes, and add that vigour to deeds of righteoufnefs, which he imparted to those of iniquity, would be the bleffing of their people, and the admiration of the world. Subjects expect a firm and active administration in their king. And, although the current of his reign may flow in one continued ftream of tranquility and imoothness, even the uniformity of that happines too frequently displeases. Love of fovereigns is but a feeble paffion in their fubjects. If they be not taught to fear and feel for their tranfgreffion, the popular influence becomes exuberant; tumults, fedition, and even rebellion itfelf, fhall attempt and fometimes fucceed in dethroning a virtuous prince, who adds not a vigorous exertion of authority to a proper mode of imparting beneficence.

(167)

Oliver, who was now abfolute, was, neverthelefs, too well inftructed in the nature of mankind, and the principles of fanaticism, which, at that time, disgraced the human race, to exert a fovereignty without offering an oftensible object, of uniting others in the supreme legislative power. Attended, therefore, with a strong guard, accompanied with the great officers of state, the lordmayor (168) mayor and aldermen of London, he proceeded from Whitehall, to that of Weftminfter. There he received that writing by which he was authorifed to govern the three kingdoms. He then took the oath which was prepared for him; and affumed the chair of ftate, with putting on his hat. The commissioners then delivered him the broad feal, and the lord-mayor the city fword, which was immediately returned to him.

By this inftrument, the fupreme legiflative power was lodged in the protector and a parliament. The executive in him and his council. A variety of conditions were therein inferted, imparing that regal power, in many inftances, of which they had deprived the late king and limiting it in others. All which, however, was fo contrived, that he might observe them, or not, as he pleased. For none, but perfons of whole integrity he was to determine, were to conflitute that parliament. This, in effect, was equal to a nomination of the members. He was obliged to call them together but for fix months, once in three years; and, during the interval of their feffions, he and his council were authorifed to enact what laws they liked. Such was now the freedom and power of parliament for which fo much blood had been fpilt.

The office of protector was appointed to be elective and that by the council. All kinds of fects in religion were tolerated. The Roman catholic and church of England were proferibed. He was then proclaimed Protector through all England, with the fame folemnity which would have attended the acceffion of a king. The nation was taxed with raifing a revenue, for the maintenance of 10,000 horfe, 20,000 foot, and a confiderable fleet.

Cromwel

Cromwel and his council, by an ordinance, united England and Scotland in one common-The parliament wealth and one government. meeting, and entering into disputes, relative to their right of affembling, and of the inftrument which conveyed the antecedent powers to the Protector, Oliver came to the painted chamber, fent for the members, reprehended them for their infolence, placed a guard at the door of the house of commons, and fuffered none to enter who would not fubscribe to be true and faithful to the Lord Protector: and that he would neither propose nor confent to alter the government, as it was fettled in one perfon, and a parliament. Three hundred of them subscribed this recognition, in a few days; and Harrison, who refused it, was taken into cuftody by a party of horfe. The houfe, however, perfifted in debating on the preceding fubjects; but voted Cromwel Protector for life. When this parliament, not corresponding perfectly with the views of Cromwel, he diffolved them, after a feffion of five months.

If this act of Oliver be compared with that of Charles, when he went to the houfe of commons and demanded feven rebellious members, it will appear, that the king required that tobe done to which he had not the means of enforcing an obedience; exposed his weakness, and invigorated the oppofition of his enemies. Cromwel, prepared with force, dared with firmness, intimidated his opponents, accomplished his defign, and fecured that iovereignty, which can never be effectually maintained, but by the application of fuch power, in proportion as the circumstances of things may occafionally require it. He knew that to truft to a war of words, in St. Stephen's chapel, would be to be undone. undone. He and the council now suppressed the publication of news-papers, without leave of the fecretary of state, as well as of all books and the fecretary of flate, as well as of all books and pamphlets unlicenfed. Thus the liberty of the prefs was fent to the devil, after all the other liberties which the fectaries had difpatched before it.

Oliver convened a new parliament, from the three kingdoms to meet at Westminster; but he fuffered no member to enter the houfe who had not been approved by his council, and had obtained a certificate of approbation from them. Pack, an independent alderman of London, proposed, in the houfe, to inveft Cromwel with the title of king; and it was carried by a majority, that the crown should be offered him. But the officers of the army opposing with menaces the accepting of that title, Cromwel, who knew when to perfevere, and when to relax, as the power of arms was with or against him, with prudence and hypocrify, declared, he could not, with a good confcience, accept the government under the title of king. He was not fo bigotted as to rifque his fovereignty for a name, or to lofe three kingdoms for a mafs, like James the fecond. His powers of protector were enlarged. They authorized him to appoint his fucceffor, and fixed his annual revenue at 1,300,0001. At this time a new house of peers was created. Cromwel met them and began his fpeech, my lords, and you the knights, citizens, &c. The commons re-admited their excluded members, inveighed against the constituting of a house of peers, and difputeed the protector's authority to convene them. My lord Hewfon, the cobler, and my lord Pride, the drayman, were peers of this right honourable house. Cromwel, in this house resolved to support those lords he had made, and diffolved the parpartament. And there ended every proceeding lative to fuch affemblies, during Oliver's life. The protector died the next-year; and it mult be 'an injuffice not to confefs, that, whilft Oliver alone poffeffed and exercifed the fupreme authority, the nation was revered by all the potentates of Europe.

Richard Cromwel was now proclaimed protector; but was foon deposed. The members of the long parliament returned, to the number of forty-Those who had been excluded, in 1648, one. were not admitted. These forty-one published a declaration, that they would act without a protector or house of peers, affumed the style of keepers of the liberties of England, and iffued all writs, patents, &c. in their names. This fag-end of the commons, was, in derifion, called the rump. The army demanded a general, and thare in the government. The parliament difmiffed Lambert, Defborough, and others. The foldiers mutinyed. Lambert met the speaker going to the house, turned him back, and the rump was again difperfed.

It was the army that now affumed the supreme power, and chofe Fleetwood their general. They conftituted twenty-three men, of whom the greateft part were general officers; and indued them with the care of government under the name of a committee of fafety. The committee of fafety now, in their turn, vielded to the rump, which again refumed the government. They appointed a council of state. Monk arrived, the secluded members met him at Whitehall, and voted him general of all the forces of the three kingdoms. The act alfo was now paffed, which diffolved that house of commons, that for 19 years had proved fo fatal to the liberties of this nation. A council of state then affumed Ζ fumed the government of the realm; and Charles the fecond was reflored.

Whoever shall attentively confider the principles of these fanatic rebels, will certainly discern that, in civil and religious tenets, they neceffarily lead to the deftruction of all the conflitutional rights of this kingdom, and the erecting of delpotism over our fouls and bodies. It is abiolutely indifputable, that liberty, both civil and religious, were but mere words, by which the people were constantly missed to the destruction of their own happines; and that the reality of obtaining those bleffings did. not at any time, enter the imaginations of their leductive enflavers, or once appear in their tranfactions. During this term of nineteen years, oppreffion and cruelty difcriminated all their parliamentary ordinances and actions, under various modes of tyranny. 1st. The two houles, without a king and bishops. 2d. An eternal house of commons, or oligarchy, without the lords. 2d. Cromwel and a council of officers. 4th. A protector and one hundred and twenty men, nominated and convened by his orders. 5th. A protector alone. 6th. A protector, and a houle of commons, confifting of members only which he approved. 7th. A protector and a parliament of new-made lords and commons. 8th. Richard Cromwel, protector, with a parliament. 9th. Rump parliament. 10th. Keepers of the liberties of England. 11th. Lambert and the army. 12th. The rump again. 13th. A council of State.

At length, after multiplied oppreffions and aggravated cruelties had been relentlefsly exercifed under this eternal revolution of abfurd forms, and anarchical tyranny; after the devaftation of the realm, by flaughter, rapine, and fanatic fury, had fo fo long revelled in full career, no end was feen of their calamities but by returning to that very form of government, which they had deftroyed. Charles the fecond and the conflictution were reftored together; an event which, although at prefent it be affectedly treated with neglect, is undoubtedly equal in national advantages to the revolution. Unleis the re-eftabliftment of the conflictution, which was abfolutely fubverted, be a lefs felicity than that event which prevented its demolition.

(173)

During the reign of Charles the fecond, the fame prefbyterian ipirit of perfecution, democracy, and king-killing prevailed. Popery and flavery were constantly united in their mouths, which never exifted in the realm. Prefbyterianifm and liberty were, in like manner, conjoined, that never dwelt together And, under the name of protestants, they infidioufly connected themfelves with the church of England, against which they as really protested as against the papal. These gave pretext to all their iniquitous intentions. In confequence of this relentless presbyterian spirit, the prince of Orange, lord Shaftesbury, Ruffel, Sydney, and others, entered into a confederacy with Titus Oates, Bedloe, and fuch perjurers, to forge a plot, which was, to accuse the Roman catholics of confpiring the death of the king. The fulleft disproof of what they fwore was of no avail: and a number of innocent men were facrificed on the infernal altar of prefbyterian perfidy, in whole religion regi-This forgery not answering cides alone are faints. their delign, the fame perfons, with Ferguson, Rumbold, and others, all prefbyterians, refolved on the affaffination of the king, at the Rye-house. on his return from Newmarket. An event, totally unforefeen. Ź 2 . 1 unforeseen, prevented that intended murder from being carried into execution.

(174)

James the fecond, that injudicious bigot, intending to abrogate the teft-act, and alike admit papifts, prefbyterians, and all others of the fectarian tribes, into all offices, both civil and military, the presbyterians became his fast friends, and avowed abettors of his defigns on the conftitution. They received this gracious offer with the most profound professions of loyalty to his perfon, and with the greatest gratitude for his goodnes. In their addreffes, thanks and praife were accompanied with virulent fuggestions of what they had fuffered from the church of England. In these they denominated the Roman catholics, their brethren and fellow fufferers for confcience lake. " Lob, whom Burnet calls, an eminent man among the differences, was entirely gained to the court, and advifed the king to fend the bifhops to the tower." He was the Father Petre of the fanatics. At the fame time, "the popilh nobility, and almost all of every degree, pressed the king earnestly to let the thing fall." Sunderland, the new and occasional convert, for one reason; and Petre, the Jefuit, for another, were not among the difereter Catholics. At the fame time, the archbishop of Canterbury, with fix of his fuffragan prelates; the universities of Oxford and Cambridge; the eccleliaftics of the church of England, and the Tories, by open and honeft means, opposed the king's despotic designs; whilst the Whigs, by fecret intrigues, invited the prince of Orange into this kingdom.

The revolution was thereby effected. And yet, these sector are at this day most audaciously affuming a degree of merit, for effectuating that very revolution revolution which they oppofed. Such is the excess of confidence and falsehood in these men. No fooner had William afcended the throne of his exiled father, than these very presbyterians addressed him in terms of equal loyalty, and rejoiced as much in his elevation, as if they had been the fole means of his rife. The archbishop, and five of the bishops, without whofe glorious opposition William had never been crowned king of these realms, were deprived of their fees, and reduced to live on their private and flender incomes; because they dared not to trifle with their confciences, respecting former oaths. At the fame time, a part of their ecclefiaftical revenues might eafily and ought to have been referved for men of fuch integrity, by appointing coadjutors, during their lives, to officiate in their diocefes. But William had no affection for the church of England. He was convinced, from the murders of De Wit, in Holland; from their fupporting, by perjuries, the forgery of the popifh plot; and their actual confpiracy to affaffinate king Charles the fecond; and from what he felt from the fame principles in his own bofom, that the prefbyterians had no other motives to their actions than felf-intereft; and that they would fupport the world fovereign that ever reigned, when it conduced to their iniquitous advantages, to the ruin of the beft, who opposed them. He therefore indulged them, during his fitting on the throne; and although he had folemnly conformed to the church of England, he kept one Caritairs, a Scotch presbyterian, to be his domestic chaplain, to whole advice he paid great regard.

(* 175)

It is an observation of a political writer, of the most exalted eminence, that Cæsar was as much a greater villain, and enemy to his country, than Cataline,

(176)

Cataline, as the destruction of the Roman liberties exceeded the intending of it. The fame may be applied to the prefbyterians and catholics, with this difference only, that the latter did never intend to fubvert, but always fupported the conflitution, whilft their religion prevailed; and, after it was exploded, had no other views than the reftoration of their church. Befides this, their attempts were feeble, and even that execrable plot, of the 5th of November, was undertaken by fourteen only, unknown to all the others of that religion; from which time they have lived the most peaceable of fubjects, uncomplaining of those penal laws which still hang over them; and not only refcind the free exercise of their religion, but are unchriftianly fevere in the civil rights with which the fectaries have been indulged. Thefe laws, however requifite they might have been at their inftitution, are they not at prefent a difgrace to government, and to the liberal spirit of our church and constitution?

In the mean while, the presbyterians, during the grand rebellion, man, woman, and child, were engaged, with all their powers, to fubvert the conftitution of this realm, both civil and ecclefiaftical, and effected it; for whill the men were fighting in their fanatic caule, the women and the children were feeking the lord, in prayer, for that fuccefs, which deftroyed their rights and liberties. From that day, to the prefent, they have uniformly perfitted in being the friends, advocates, and promoters of continental connections; wars for alien interests; augmenting taxes and accumulating debts. They supported the establishment of a flanding army; the converting triennial into feptennial parliaments; by enacting acts, by fultaining parliamentary corruption, and every law, which they now pretend to execrate; ecrate, because their own iniquities and rebellious actions have rendered it impracticable for them to be discontinued, without the danger of permitting them to effectuate their rebellious purposes.

No iooner was his prefent majefty enthroned, than their teachers, either becaule the annual fum which by his grandfather had been given among them, was diminished, or no longer paid, began to feel their consciences again grow tender. God, like the Diana of the Ephefians, was now once more to be ferved in their own way; becaufe, by that craft, they had their wealth. They then returned to their old rebellious practices. The king was traduced with lefs caufe, and more enormity, than ever fovereign had known before. Popery was again afferted to be coming in. The articles of the church of England grew offenfive, and application to parliament was made to have them altered. Tythes were Jewish, popish, and to be abolished; and the test-act to be repealed. All these were feditious clamours, excited for teafons fimilar to the preceding in their rebellion against Charles the first; and clamours only they can be justly deemed: for of what avail is the facramental teft to keep these men from honours, posts, and places? on such occasions, were the bread as large as St. Paul's cathedral, and did the cup contain as much wine as the great tun at Heidelberg, they would iwallow every grain and drop without hefitation or a wry face. At the fame time, although the oath of allegiance has been taken in the morning, they will declaim against the lawful power of their fovereign before night; and with the facrament, yet within them, execrate that very church to which they had fo folemnly conformed. Decide then, my fellow councountrymen, of the church of England, whether, from the hands of Roman catholics, or of prefbyterians, your deftruction be most likely to Reflect on the rebellious acts of the proceed. Boftonian fanatics, who would impose on you alone the taxes to support the state; admire and applaud the wildom and the justice of parliament in begining a reformation of the catholic church in Canada, by a truly chriftian indulgence of religious liberty; and in extending the loyal fubjects of Quebec behind these reftlets hypocrites. Sensible of their happinefs beneath his majefty, they will be ready to employ their arms to quell rebellion, whilft the prefbyterian race, who, by lying calumnies, ever traduce their fovereign, would terrify you with the coming in of popery and flavery; feduce you from allegiance, and incite you to arms. Yet fuch is the indifputable fact, that, during the fourteen years in which his majefty hath reigned over us, neither this kingdom, nor any other ever enjoyed to continued a feries of felicity, in which not one attempt has hitherto been made to invade your property, to diminish your rights and liberties, or to deftroy the lives and treasure of his subjects. And to the refutation of this truth, I defy all mankind.

Believe not, therefore, that your king, who is eminently dignified with every virtue of Son, Father, Hufband, Brother, Friend, whofe acts pronounce him merciful, and by whom all your complaints have been removed, as far as his authority can extend, can ever entertain an idea that may tend to leffen your felicity, or prevent its improvement.

At the fame time, be confident that the men of thefe days, who are actuated by like principles with those rebellious fanatics of Charles the first, whofe whole fouls are fraught with every vice, will convert religion to their inftrument of iniquity, to feduce you to rebellion, and to promote the triumph of their despotism. Appeal to your own sensations, and you shall find, that their seditious acts can mean but to delude you to their nefarious and interefted purposes, by erecting their dominion, and eftablishing your flavery, which their ancestors fo perfidioufly accomplished. Have not the Jesuits, who entertain principles less pernicious to government, and whole actions bear no comparison in iniquity with those sectarians, been justly expelled from almost all the realms of Europe? exert, therefore, my countrymen, your indignation against fuch infidious and deftructive villainy. Rouze from your feduction; and manfully proceed to every act of loyalty to the beft of kings; to the prefervation of your rights, liberties, conftitution and country.

(179)

FINIS.

The following new Books and new Editions are just published

By S. HOOPER, No. 25, LUDGATE-HILL,

And Sold by all BOOKSELLERS in Great Britain and Ireland.

The Two first Volumes of the following Work, comprised in Thirty Numbers, containing 174 Views, elegantly engraved by the most eminent Artists, and printed on a fine Super-Royal Paper, in Quarto.

No. 31, 32, 33, 34, and 35, of Vol. III. are published, and will be continued Monthly, at Three Shillings each. N. B. Those Continuous and Ladian who do not shuft to much for it is Williams and Ladian

2. B. Those Gentlemen and Ladies who do not chuse to purchase it in Volumes, may begin with No. I. and have them delivered Weekly or Monthly.

ANTIQUITIES

E N G L A N D and W A L E S.

Being a Collection of VIEWS of the most remarkable

RUINS and ANCIENT BUILDINGS:

To each of which is added,

An historical Account of its fituation, when and by whom built, with every intereffing circumfrance relating thereto, from the beft Authorities.

By FRANCIS GROSE , Efq. F.R.S.

THE prefent laudable tafte for the ftudy of the Antiquities of this Kingdom, has induced the Author to offer to the Public this collection, of which he thinks it neceffary to give the following information.

The Views here given were drawn on the fpot with the utmost accuracy; and though it is hoped they will not be found void of picturesque merit, yet that has been only a secondary confideration, the main design being to convey faithful representations of the present appearance of those perishing monuments of ancient magnificence.

Of the hiftorical accounts and defcriptions, those relative to Monashic Remains are extracted from Dugdale, Tanner, and other acknowledged authorities: those of Castles and Civil Buildings, from the furveys of counties, and our most approved historians.

To these will be added fuch particulars, as the author could collect from a careful inspection of the places themselves, as well as those which have been communicated to him from the observations of his Friends, to many of whom, eminent in this study, he has been obliged for very interesting and curious Accounts from Original Manuscripts, and also from many in the possibility of the Proprietors themselves, as well as from those in public and private libraries.

One Number, containing Six Plates, finely executed, and printed ou a Superfine Royal Paper, in Quarto, will be published every month, till the whole is completed, which will confist of four Volumes, of fifteen Numbers each.

In order to make it more generally interefting, the views are not published in counties, or in any regular fuccession; they are therefore not paged. This will enable the purchasters to arrange them in whatever manner they think best.

* As it is the Author's Defire to make this Work as complete as poffible, he will be obliged to any Gentleman, refiding near remarkable Pieces of Antiquity, to favour him with any information, refpecting either the Antient Hiftory, or Prefent State thereof; as also with the Names of the prefent Proprietors, directed to the Publicher.

N. B. Any Corrections or Omificons in the Accounts already published will be thankfully knowledged.

ş.,

That

That the Public may form fome idea of the execution of this Work, the Publicher has given an extract of the characters given of it in the Reviews.

From the CRITICAL REVIEW, Sept. and Oft. 1773.

"TO facilitate the fludy of our national Antiquities, the author has introduced this volume with a copious account of various particulars relative to the ancient buildings in England, which is compiled from the beft authorities, and digefted in a clear, comprehensive, and methodical arrangement. From this preliminary discourse the reader will not only reap much entertainment and instruction, but be prepared for the better understanding the subsequent part of the Work. It is therefore proper that we begin our Review with a general detail of the subjects which are mentioned in this fensible and interesting Preface.

The first fubject treated of, is Casses. Of these the Author observes, that such as remain are, for the most part, of no higher antiquity than the Norman Conquest; for though the Saxons, Romans, and perhaps even the ancient Britons, had casses built with store, yet they were few in number, and, at that period, either to much definoved or decayed, that little more than their ruins were remaining. The erection of castles appears to have kept pace with the progress of the feudal fystem; but becoming foon extramely numerous, and their owners exercising intolerable oppretsion in their neighbourhood, it was agreed, in a treaty between king Stephen and Henry II. when duke of Normandy, that all the casses built within a certain period should be demolished; and, in consequence of this stipulation, many are faid to have been assually razed. On Henry's accession to the throne feveral others were demolished; and a prohibition was issued from erecting new ones, without an especial licence from the king-

After delineating the usual plan of the ancient caftles, the author delivers an account of the various engines by which fieges were conducted in these times.

The fubject on which our author next enters is Monasteries. He øbferves, that the æra of the first institution of these religious houses in England is extremely uncertain; some historiaus and antiquarians fixing it soon after the Christian epoch; while others, with greater probability, suppose that event not to have taken place till fome years after the commencement of the fixth century. The date of the foundation of numeries in this country, he observes, is involved in the fame obfearing with the origin of the monastic life.

Mr. Grofe recites diffinely the progrefs of religious foundations through the feveral fublequent reigns, to the commencement of the Reformation.

The fubject to which our author next proceeds, in his very interesting Preface, is the ancient modes of architecture in this country.

The author has further elucidated this curious fubject by a variety of notes, extracted from approved writers; in compiling which, Mr. Grofe difcovers himfelf to have confulted every authority from whence any information could be drawn; and, as an additional illustration, he has prefented his readers with engraved specimens of Saxon and Gothic arches, ornaments, &c.

The Preface to this work concludes with a brief account of Domesday-book, begun by order of William the Conqueror, and containing an account of the lands in almost all the counties of England; with a description of the quantity and particular nature of them; mentioning the rents, taxations, the several possess, with their number, and distinct degrees.

As to the Deferiptions of the feveral Ancient Buildings introduced, those readers who would more fully gratify their curiofity, must have recourse to the original, where they will find every article illustrated by a perspective engraving, agreeably picturesque, and exhibiting lively representations.

For hiltorical or legendary Anecdotes we refer our Readers to the Work itfelf, where they will generally find a detail of the fucceffion through which the property of the feveral ancient buildings has been conveyed, from their foundation to the prefent time. The great attention which the author appears to have bestowed on the work, and the accuracy of the numerous plates whereby it is illustrated, illustrated, leave no room to doubt of its meeting with the encouragement of the Public. When Mr. Grose has completed his defign, we shall have the fatisfaction of beholding the most entertaining and valuable collection of the antiquities of this country, that has hitherto been made.

From the MONTHLY REVIEW, Nov. 1773.

THE Publication before us claims our attention from the refpect which the curious and inquifitive mind ever pays to hiftorical refearches into antiquity ; and although it may not be confidered as altogether an original undertaking, this tribute of praife is due to Mr. Grove, - That he has very fenfibly, and laudably, employed his talents to a very pleafing and generous purpofe, in thus endeavouring to refcue these venerable piles from the profeription of time, -as denounced by Shakespeare-

* THE CLOUD-CAPT TOWERS, THE GORGEOUS PALACES,

THE SOLEMN TEMPLES, --- SHALL DISSOLVE," &c.

As the hours of life are of too much importance to be foundered away, the method which this ingenious gentleman has taken to fill up every interval of leifure, does him much honour, and is pregnant with very particular advantages ; for while he is drawing from oblivion, and introducing to our acquaintance, many noble and ancient families, he is raifing a monument of fame to himfelf. And, belides, the different changes which thele perishing memorials of pride and dominion have undergone fince the days of their earlieft poffessors, exhibit a ftriking and influctive, though it may feem a trite, leffon of morality, in pointing out and proving the mutability of human greatnefs.

A collection of fuch portraits as the prefent, with the annals fubjoined, may, like a cabinet of medals, be confidered as a body of hiftory. With deference to those learned gentlemen who have infisted on the erudition of the latter, we fix a relative value on the drawings before us; for, like other epitomes, these performances may greatly contribute to affilt the memory, fettle many difputed pointsand prove eminently serviceable in the illustration of our national history.

Mr. Grofe has introduced his elegant engravings with a very copious and entertaining Preface, perfectly adapted to the fubject, and illustrated with nine very curious copper-plates. In this preliminary difcourse he has ingeniously difcriminated the different forms and manner of building, and of befieging, caftles, &c. at the different periods of time, with a fuccinet account of the ancient English artichecture, in general; he has described the state of the monasteries in the earlieft ages of their existence in this country; and has explained that venerable monument of British antiquity, the Domefday-Book.

These views are uniformly engraved on diffinct plates, and are each the subject of one entire leaf of the book ; standing as head-pieces to the letter-prefs accounts, or annals. of the refpective buildings, and the families, &c. to which they belonged. The drawings, though limited, are mafterly ; and the engrav ings are very well executed.

H.

As many People are defirous of bawing the following Work in Numbers, it is proposed to publish it Monthly, each Number to contain two Copper-Plates (with Descriptions) beautifully coloured, and print on Imperial Paper. Frice each Number 55.3d.

N. B. The Work may be had compleat for Five Guineas, being the original Price, without the Descriptions, which alone fell for 10s. 6d.

THE PORTRAITS OF BRITISH BIRDS, &c. on 40 Copper-Plates; confifting of 62 Subjects, drawn, and moft beautifully coloured from Nature,

Mr. HAYES. By

The generous Encouragement this Work (which is dedicated, by Permission, to Her Grae te Duchefs of Northumberland) has been honoured with by the Nobility and Gentry, i a fuf fient Testimony of its Merit, and their Approbation.

The Defcriptions are now elegantly printed, and ready to deliver for Half a Guines, to the who have already purchased the Prints.

A New Edition, being the 8th, enlarged and brought down to the prefent Time. A Work very intereffing to those who are concerned in, or who intend to invest their Property, in any of the Public Funds.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN BROKER: or, A GUIDE to ENCHANGE-ALLEY. In which the Nature of the feveral Funds, vulgarly called the Stocks, is clearly explained, and accurate Computations are formed of the Average Value of Eaft-India Stock for feveral Years, from the current Year. The Myftery and Iniquity of Stock-Jobbing is laid before the Public in a new and Impartial Light. The Method of Transferring Stock, and of Buying and Selling the feveral Government Securities, without the Affiftance of a Broker, is made intelligible to the meaneft Capacity: and an Account is given of the Laws in Force relative to Brokers, Clerks at the Bank, &c. With Directions how to avoid the Loffes that are frequently fuftained by the Defruction of Bank Notes, India Bonds, &c. by Fires and other Accidents.

With an Hiftorical Account of the Origin, Progrefs, and prefent State of Public-Credit, Banking, and the Sinking-Fund. To which is now added, a Supplement, containing Rules for forming a Judgement of the real Caufes of the Rife or Fall of the Stocks; and feveral useful Tables of Latereft, &c.

By THOMAS MORTIMER, Efq. Price fewed 25.6d.

IV.

THE ELEMENTS of COMMERCE, POLITICS and FI-NANCES. In three Treatifes on those Important Subjects. By THOMAS MORTIMER, Efq. Author of the above Work, Price fewed 155.

Extract from the Critical Review of the Character of this Work.

" A competent Knowledge of the Subject discuffed in this Work is, undoubtedly, of the most effential Confequence to these who would qualify themselves for the Direction of public Affairs; and it is therefore with pleafure we behold political and commercial Principles delineated on a rational and inftructive Plan. Extremely complicated in its Nature, and not reduced to a regular Syft:m, political Occonomy has long been confidered as a vague and indetermined Science, of which the Theory was founded on no eftablished Criterion of Judgment, and the Practice rather guided by arbitrary Views, than the Contemplation of public Utility. The Writings of the Ancients afford but little Light on this Subject, that can be useful in modern Times; for in the States of Greece and Rome, where the Laws were intentionally enacted for the Good of the People, and from which Republics the Observations of Philosophers were chiefly drawn, neither Commerce nor Finances formed, in any great Degree, the Object of Legiflative Attention. Sully and Colbert will be immortalized in the Annals of France, for the improvements they introduced respecting the state of the country in these particulars; and we wish that from the publication of the work before us, the British youth will now rival those celebrated Ministers in point of political knowledge.

"With refpect to this Work in general, the Elements of Commerce, Politics and Finances, are here delineated in a perfpicuous and methodical manner, and the author has illuftrated by appofite examples, fuch principles of these fciences, as appear at first fight to be either repugnant or lefs obvious to common Apprehension : On the feveral fubjects of what he treats, he has canvassed the fentiments of the most eminent writers with freedom and candour, and where he differst from their authority, his conclusions are supported by just and rational arguments. The Work will certainly be useful to those who would acquire a competent knowledge of political occonomy; and feveral hints are thrown out on Finances, which we could wish to fee adopted by Government."

AN ESSAY ON TRADE AND COMMERCE: Containin Obfervations on Taxes, as they are fuppofed to affect the Price of Labour in our Manufact ries; together with fome interefling Reflections on the Importance of our Trade to Am rica. Oftavo, Price fewed 4s.

VI.

The ELEMENTS of TACTICS; Containing new Observation on the Military Art, with 12 Copper-Plate Tables to illustrate the different Manœuvre Offavo, Price Jerged 55.

Character of this Work in the Critical Review.

"This appears to be the Work of an ingenious and intelligent Officer; it traces to the Source many Errors in the prefent Syftem of Tactics in Europe, and fuggefts a Method by whithey may be remedied. The Remarks on the Military Discipline and Arrangements of the Gree and Romans have particular Merit."

VII.

Elegantly printed in Qne Vol. 8vo. 5st fexued, The Second Edition, Revifed, with large Additions, and the Catalogue of Authors greatly increased.

TRACTS on PRACTICAL AGRICULTURE and GARDEN JNG: In which the Advantage of imitating the Garden Culture in the Field is fully prove by a Seven Years Courfe of Experiments; particularly addreffed to the Gentlemen Farmers Great Britain. With Obfervations made in a late Tour through France, Flanders, at Holland. Alfo feveral uleful Improvements in Stoves and Greenhoufes. To which added, a complete Chronological Catalogue of Englifh Authors on Agriculture, Gardenin &c. By R. WESTON, Efg. Author of the Univerfal Batanift.

VIII.

- The following Treatife is particularly adapted for the Ufe of the Gentleman Farmer and Husbandman, as it contains Obfervations on the Changes of the Seafons, that may tend greatly to the Improvement of Cultivation, and prove very profitable to those who are any ways concerned in Husbandry.
- AN ESSAY ON THE WEATHER: With Remarks on the Shepherd of Banbury's Rules for judging of its Changes; and Directions for prefervin Lives and Buildings from the fatal Effects of Lightning. By J. MILLS, Efg. F. R. Member of the Societies of Agriculture of Paris and Rouen, &c.

Alfo, by the fame Author, Price fewed 4s.

ESSAYS, MORAL, PHILOSOPHICAL, and POLITICAL, o the following Subjects: viz. On Philosophy and Philosophers. On Projects. On Love a Jealoufy. On Commerce and Luxury. And on Agriculture.

N. B. The Authors of the Critical Review conclude their Account of this Work as follow: viz. "We may fay with Juffice of the Whole, that they diffeover the Author to be a Perfe of Learning, Tafte, and Philosophical Sentiment; and that the Third Effay is particular ingenious, and contains many juft Obfervations on modern Manners."

1X.

TRACTS on the LIBERTY, SPIRITUAL and TEMPORAL, C PROTESTANTS in ENGLAND. By ANTHONY ELLYS, D. D. Late Lord Bifue of St. David's. The Second Edition, in Quarto, Price bound 176.

х.

HOMER TRAVESTIE, Being a Burlesque Translation of th Bliad, with two Humorous Frontispieces. Price sewed, 55. in two Volumes,

. . .

The fame Book, Quarto. Price 125,

1

1

A RATIONAL ACCOUNT of the CAUSES oF RATIONAL ACCOUNT OF the CAUSES OF CHRONIC DISEASES; wherein a natural, cafy, and fafe Way of preventing, as well as curing, those Difeafes, is pointed out; and the true Origin of the Hippocratic Method of Practice briefly explained. The Second Edition. — To which are annuxed, New Strictures on the Theory of Fevers, and on the Sanctorian Doctrine of Perspiration : With An Appendix on Dist and Exercise. By JOHN MORLAND, M. D. Price 18.

XII,

The LIFE of MADAM POMPADOUR, A new Edition, being the Fourth, revised, currected, and greatly enlarged by the Author of the first Volume ; with a Continuation from the Year 1757 to her Death, and a beautiful Head of the Marchionels, elegantly engraved, taken from an original Painting.

N. B. Even the first Edition of this Work, imperfect as it is, was translated into most of the European Languages. In Germany, it was reprinted fourteen Times, and leveral Impreffions were suppressed in Holland, at the Requisition of the French Ambassador. In Two Vols. Price bound 56.

XIII.

TRAVELS through ITALY: Containing general Observations on that Country; with the most authentic Account yet published of capital Pieces in Painting, Sculpure, and Architecture; including Remarks on the antient and prefent State of Italy, of the Arts and Sciences which have flourished there, and of 1 afte in Painting. By JOHN NORTHALL, Efq.

With Copper-plates, engraved from Drawings taken on the Spot. Bound 6s.

XIV.

A VOYAGE to the EAST-INDIES; Containing authentic Accounts of the Government in general of that vait Empire ; its Religion, Cuftoms, Manpers, and Antiquities; with general Reflections on the Trade of India. Alfo a true State of the Military Transactions with the French, &c. to the Conclusion of the general Peace. By J. H. G R O S E. A new Edition, illustrated with Views and feveral Plans not in the former Edition.

To which is added, A JOURNEY from ALEPPO to BUSSERAH, over the DESERT, by Mr. CARMICHAEL. Two Volumes, Octavo, Price 105. 6d. fewed.

XV.

The Second Edition, with the Addition of ALLIS'S COMPLETE TABLE OF VERES elegantly engraved on a large Copper-plate, (which alone fells for 1s) Frice 1s. 6d. bound,

The COMPLETE VOCABULARY, in English and French, and in French and English, properly accented, and disposed under above one hundred Heads, either alphabetical, or agree-the to the natural Order of Things; comprehending at one View all Words that can occur relative to any Subject. The Genders of Nouns, and the Conjuga-sion of all the Veros, are denoted. This Vocabulary contains a great Number of Words used in daily Conversation, which are not to be found in Boyer's Dictionary, or Chambaud's Vocabulary, &c. 244

XVI.

Illustrated with exact Plans taken on the Spot, Price fewed 35.

100 100

An AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE OF the RUSSIAN EXPEDITION against the TURKS by Sea and Land : Containing every material Circumstance of their Proceedings, from their first Sailing from Petersburgh, to the Destruction of the Turkish Fleet in the Archipelzgo, XVII.

A NEW SYSTEM OF PRACTICAL ARITHMETIC. IN THREE PARTS. Part I. Contains all the fundamental Rules; with new Obfer-vations relating thereto. Part IIc The most uleful Rules in Proportion, with their Application to Trade; a Compendium of Menfurations; and feveral curious Algebraical Rules, Part III Demonstrations of the Principal Rules; and a Complete Sett of Tables, with their Construction and Ufe, calculated for Men of Business. By WILLIAM SCOTT. Price bound 3s. 6d.

٠

17]

一分 XVIII.

A NEW TREATISE on SHORT HAND, Comprised in eigh Copper-plate Tables, wherein the Art of Short Hand Writing is reduced to fo fimple a State that the Learner may, without buidening the Memory with difficult Rules; become a Pro ficient in this useful Art, by a few Days Application, without the Affiliance of a Maftei Price only 18. 6d.

XIX.

- The COMPLETE LETTER-WRITER: Or, LADY'S POLITI SECRETARY, Containing a Variety of elegant, interefing, and inftructive Letters, intended a Models to form the true Epiftolary Style on every Point effential to Happinefs or Entertainment,
- In this Collection are many admired Epifolary Narratives, which have never been hitherto at tempted in any Book of the Kind. Likewife feveral Original Letters of Wit, by Ladies o the first Rank in the Literary World. With a Variety of Poetical Letters, Humorous and Pathetic, Sentimental and Deferiptive. Allo, Cards of Compliment and Condolance, o Friendship and Refentment. With Rules to be observed in writing Letters, and the different Forms of Addrefs. The Whole fo calculated, that any Perfon may, in a very flort Time, be enabled to write with Perfpicuity, Eafe, and Propriety. Price bound as. By a Real LADY of FASHION.

XX.

- Proper to be fung in all Churches and Chapels; as also in private Families; it being particularly adapted for the Voice, Harpfichord, and Guittar, which renders it an agreeable Sunday's Companion for Young Ladies, and others, who have a Taste for Divine Harmony.
- The NEW POCKET COMPANION to the MAGDALEN CHAPEL : Containing all the Odes, Pfalms, Anthems, and Hymns, with their feveral favourite Airs now in use (never before made public), and a thorough Bals for the Harpfichord or Organ, New Edition, Price 15. 6d.

By ADAM SMITH, late Organist to the Charity.

XXI.

The 8th Edition, greatly improved, and invented for the Inftruction and Amulement of Children from three to fix Feet bigh,

The POETICAL ORACLE, A PACK of CARDS: By the Use of which, without a tedious Confultation of the Stars, or the more informe Correspondence with Familiars, any Perfon may become, in an Inflant of Time, a Complete Fortune Teller. Now first published by the REAL CONJUROR, who has for a Length of Time entertained and edified, as well as aftonished all Parts of Europe, and is now in London. That no One may imagine this an useles Performance, the Conjuror will return the Money for any Pack, when it shall be proved, the Directions duly observed, that it told a fingle Fality.

XXII.

THE COMPLETE COLLECTION OF ANTIQUE GEMS; Etched after the Manner of REMBRANDT, by that celebrated Mafter, THOMAS WORLIDGE. most of them in the Posseficition of the Nobility and Centry of this King= dom. They are the first Impression, and exceeding fearce. Price, elegantly bound in Morocco, 20 Guineas. N.B. Single ones may be had to complete Setts.

SCHOOL BOOKS

By Mr. PORNY, French-Master at Eton-College.

- I. The PRINCIPLES of the FRENCH LANGUAGE, with a prefatory Introduction concerning the beft Method of teaching the Pronunciation, &c. to young Beginners. The whole in French and English. Price. 15. 6d.
- II. The PRACTICAL FRENCH GRAMMAR, containing all that is neceflary to be learnt to acquire a competent Knowledge of that Language; comprised in a rational and clear Method. 2d Edition, Price 25.

S. AL

- SII. GRAMMATICAL EXERCISES, flewing how the Rules of French Syntax are to be applied in every part of its Confiruction; digefted in a plain, methodical, and concife Order. 3d Edition, Price 18. 6d.
- IV. MODELS of LETTERS; in French and English, defigned for the Infruction of those who are definous of acquiring the true Style and exact Manner of French epistolary Correspondence. Price 4s.
- V. NEW DICTIONARY, in Two Parts, English and French, and French and English. Price, bound, 58.
- VI. ENGLISH PARTICLES ILLUSTRATED: Containing what is most difficult and seccellary for writing Latin with Eafe, Accuracy and Elegance. By THOMAS STURZAMER. Price bound is.
- VII. The COMPTING-HOUSE ASSISTANT: or BOOK-KEEPING MADE EASY. Being a complete practical Treatife on Merchants Accounts, after the moft approved Method. Wherein almost all the Varieties that can happen in that useful Art are introduced; and explained in 6 concile and edg a Manner, that these who cannot conveniently apply to a Matter, may, in a tery front Time, form themfelves for the Compting.house, without one. Methodized in the Nature of real Businefs. 2d Edit. enlarged. Pr. bound 22. 6d. By JOHN COOKE, Accomptant.

Dr. MORLAND'S UNIVERSAL FAMILY PILLS,

Which operate, as a Purge in all Conflictions, without occasioning either Sicknefs or Gripes. Price 1s. 6d. the Box, with the usual Allowance to Shop-keepers to fell again.

"THIS Medicine is now first offered to the Public, and to the candid trial of Medical Practitioners. One remarkable property, which diffinguishes this Medicine from, perhaps, all others known, is, that it has been experienced, in some thousand inflances, to operate, as a Purge, with equal fafety, eafe, and efficary, in all conflictutions, even the most delicate. It has been found equally efficacious in the prevention, as well as cure, of those chronical diffese, and pervous complaints, particularly mentioned in the Directions.

In occational or habitual coftivenefs, thefe Fills are an effectual remedy; and have this advantage above other purgatives. That when the complaint is once removed, it is not fo apt to return again. Hence the fingular benefit accruing from their ufe, to British conflictutions effectally, in hot climates, and in long fea voyages.

In the intention of a Family Purge, they will prove univerfally falutary and beneficial, by cleanfing the flomach and bowels from those vi(cid, or flimy, and vitiated bilious humours that are for frequently collected in them, conflictuing the fource of variou: difeates, as well chronic es acute, to which people of every rank are liable; but the delicate, the fludious, and the fedentary, more particularly fo.

The AUTHOR, subo is known to have a reputation to flake, pludges it to the Public, on the fingularly mild, pleufing, and fuccefsful operation of this Medicine.

In the Prefs, and speedily will be Published,

L Neatly Printed in One Volume, 8vo. and Embellished with elegant Engravings of the present KING and QUEEN of FRANCE.

A DESCRIPTION of the CORONATION of the KINGS and QUEENS of FRANCE. With an HISTORICAL ACCOUNT of the INSTITUTION of that AUGUST CEREMONY in FRANCE, and other Kingdoms in EUROPE. By M. MENIN, Counfellor to the Parliament of Metz.

п.

Neatly Printed in 4to. Embellished with TEN ELEGANT COPPER PLATES, and feveral Engraved EMBLEMATICAL HEAD and TAIL-PIECES,

I D Y L S. By M. GESNER, Author of the DEATH of ABEL, And MORAL TALES, by M. DIDEROT. To which is added, A LETTER from M. GESNER to M. FUSLIN, on LANDSCAPE PAINTING. Translated from the Orignal, by W. HOOPER, M. D.

HI.

A CATALOGUE of PLANTS and SEEDS Sold by KENEDY and LEE, NURSERY and SEEDSMEN, at the VINEYARD, HAMMERSMITH, Price 15, 64,